

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE

The International Library of Technology is the outgrowth of a large and increasing demand that has arisen for the Reference Libraries of the International Correspondence Schools on the part of those who are not students of the Schools. As the volumes composing this Library are all printed from the same plates used in printing the Reference Libraries above mentioned, a few words are necessary regarding the scope and purpose of the instruction imparted to the students of—and the class of students taught by—these Schools, in order to afford a clear understanding of their salient and unique features.

The only requirement for admission to any of the courses offered by the International Correspondence Schools, is that the applicant shall be able to read the English language and to write it sufficiently well to make his written answers to the questions asked him intelligible. Each course is complete in itself, and no textbooks are required other than those prepared by the Schools for the particular course selected. The students themselves are from every class, trade, and profession and from every country; they are, almost without exception, busily engaged in some vocation, and can spare but little time for study, and that usually outside of their regular working hours. The information desired is such as can be immediately applied in practice, so that the student may be enabled to exchange his present vocation for a more congenial one, or to rise to a higher level in the one he now pursues. Furthermore, he wishes to obtain a good working knowledge of the subjects treated in the shortest time and in the most direct manner possible.

In meeting these requirements, we have produced a set of books that in many respects, and particularly in the general plan followed, are absolutely unique. In the majority of subjects treated the knowledge of mathematics required is limited to the simplest principles of arithmetic and mensuration, and in no case is any greater knowledge of mathematics needed than the simplest elementary principles of algebra, geometry, and trigonometry, with a thorough, practical acquaintance with the use of the logarithmic table. To effect this result, derivations of rules and formulas are omitted, but thorough and complete instructions are given regarding how, when, and under what circumstances any particular rule, formula, or process should be applied; and whenever possible one or more examples, such as would be likely to arise in actual practice—together with their solutions—are given to illustrate and explain its application.

In preparing these textbooks, it has been our constant endeavor to view the matter from the student's standpoint, and to try and anticipate everything that would cause him trouble. The utmost pains have been taken to avoid and correct any and all ambiguous expressions—both those due to faulty rhetoric and those due to insufficiency of statement or explanation. As the best way to make a statement, explanation, or description clear is to give a picture or a diagram in connection with it, illustrations have been used almost without limit. The illustrations have in all cases been adapted to the requirements of the text, and projections and sections or outline, partially shaded, or full-shaded perspectives have been used, according to which will best produce the desired results. Half-tones have been used rather sparingly, except in those cases where the general effect is desired rather than the actual details.

It is obvious that books prepared along the lines mentioned must not only be clear and concise beyond anything heretofore attempted, but they must also possess unequalled value for reference purposes. They not only give the maximum of information in a minimum space, but this information is so ingeniously arranged and correlated, and the indexes are so full and complete, that it can at once be made available to the reader. The numerous examples and explanatory remarks, together with the absence of long demonstrations and abstruse mathematical calculations, are of great assistance in helping one select the proper formula, method, or process and in teaching him how or when it should be used.

This volume deals with the display of advertisements, provides an analysis of the value of the principal mediums for advertising, as well as an exposition of the conditions and regulations peculiar to newspapers and magazines, and covers the application of the science of advertising to the promoting of retail enterprises, including department stores. Display, a subject formerly left almost entirely to the printer's consideration, now commands close attention from advertising men. The medium in which an advertisement is to appear influences both copy and display, and the selecting of mediums calls for critical investigation and the use of good judgment if the enormous sums wasted yearly in unprofitable mediums are to be reduced. Too often advertising has been regarded as an independent force. Therefore, much space is given to showing the relation between publicity methods and the business management, the goods, and the service.

The method of numbering the pages, cuts, articles, etc. is such that each subject or part, when the subject is divided into two or more parts, is complete in itself; hence, in order to make the index intelligible, it was necessary to give each subject or part a number. This number is placed at the top of each page, on the headline, opposite the page number; and to distinguish it from the page number it is preceded by the printer's section mark (§). Consequently, a reference such as § 16, page 26, will be readily found by looking along the inside edges of the headlines until § 16 is found, and then through § 16 until page 26 is found.

ADVERTISEMENT DISPLAY

TYPOGRAPHICAL DISPLAY

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

1. To be effective, an advertisement must attract attention. Apt wording of headings and appropriate illustration contribute largely to attention-attracting power. But the method of attracting attention that lends the greatest strength to apt wording and appropriate illustration is typographical display. To display an advertisement well means to give it such a typographical appearance that it will attract those whom the advertiser wishes to interest. This means giving contrast, or typographical emphasis (by the use of heavier type), to the important features of the copy—the headline, the name of the article, the name of the advertiser, some selling point of the article or time of sale, etc.—the writer selecting for display the features that he thinks are most likely to attract attention or to make an impression.

Although the word display is sometimes used loosely to refer to the general typographical effect of an advertisement, it refers specifically to the parts or lines of an advertisement set in larger or heavier type.

2. Value of Contrast.—A whole page of separate advertisements set in the same style and size of type would appear monotonous. The eye roaming over such a page would find nothing to draw it to any particular advertisement.

Copyrighted by International Textbook Company. Entered at Stationers' Hall, London

All the selling points of the various articles would be lost in the mass of body matter. Introduce a display, or contrast, line in each advertisement, emphasizing either the name of the article or a strong selling point, however, and see the power it will exert in arresting the reader's attention. If each advertisement has an identifying feature set in a larger and heavier face of type than the body matter, it becomes easy to distinguish one from another; and the eye in roaming over the page is easily drawn to those which are of interest. Figs. 1, 2, and 3 illustrate this principle.

Fig. 1 shows an advertisement set in a single paragraph of body type, without any emphasis or display. Fig. 2 shows the same advertisement with the addition of two display lines. Note how much stronger and more attractive Fig. 2 is than Fig. 1, yet the only change is in the display of the name of the article advertised and the rearrangement of the firm name. The heading in Fig. 2 catches the eye, while the advertisement in Fig. 1, owing to its lack of display, would rarely be noticed. However, the copy in Fig. 2 has not been displayed to its maximum strength. Introduce a secondary display, the strongest selling point, as in Fig. 3, and observe the effect. The main selling point of this copy is the purity of the chocolates; therefore, this feature is displayed, though it is not made quite so prominent as the heading. The name and address of the dealer being important, these lines are also given a little display.

Compare Fig. 3 with Figs. 1 and 2 and note the progressive steps from the weakest to the strongest effect. While, in this instance, the secondary display, "Guaranteed Pure," was needed to bring out the full strength of the copy, it should not be taken as a strict rule that secondary displays are always needed. The plain-rule border surrounding the advertisement shown in Fig. 3 serves to bind the whole into a single unit and aids materially in concentrating the attention.

3. So far as the typography of an advertisement is concerned, the power of attraction is of no greater importance than that of legibility. People insist that advertising shall be easy to read. They emphasize this demand by passing unheeded the advertisements set in types that are not pleasing and easily read, or the advertisements that, by a freakish arrangement, possess features that impair their legibility. Good display consists of simple, strong effects, and it makes the reading of an advertisement easy, quick, and certain. Complex elements, by diffusing the attention, fail to produce the desired results. To reach its highest effectiveness, an advertisement must be so constructed that the eye will be attracted by something striking or especially pleasing in the display; and when this has been accomplished, the arrangement of the matter that follows must appear so logical and so easy to follow that the reader will be led on to the end.

4. Misleading Display.—In preparing advertisements, misleading display should always be avoided. To make the meaning of the advertisement easy and certain, prominence should be given to the right words. Some one point in the copy of the advertisement must necessarily be the strongest, and it should be made to stand out clearly above all others.

5. Displaying Too Many Features.—The fewer points emphasized, the stronger will be the emphasis. The ad-writer should avoid emphasizing everything that might be emphasized, or the advertisement will appear a mere jumble of display type and there will be no emphasis whatever to any part of it. Expert printers say, "All display means no display." The ad-writer will do well to memorize this aphorism, for he will find that most printers are disposed to display too many parts of an advertisement.

6. Three Display Colors.—The ad-writer has three colors to deal with, namely, white, gray, and black. The white is the paper. The gray is the body matter—a mass of small, light-faced type that gives a gray effect on white paper, owing to the predominance of surrounding white, the rapid printing, and the usual poor quality of paper and ink. The black is the display type and the border, but in newspapers it is seldom a pure black. Magazines and trade papers, by the use of polished-surface papers and better inks, secure a deeper black than do newspapers.

FUNCTIONS OF DISPLAY

7. Primarily, the purpose of display is to attract attention. After this has been effected, it is necessary that the display be of the kind that will please the eye, emphasize the strong features, and make the advertisement easy to read and easy to grasp.

Attention may be attracted by the unusual appearance of the entire advertisement or by the contrast between its light and dark portions. The strongest contrast is secured by concentrating the black and gray portions. For example, one or two display lines in large type will stand out much stronger than several display lines in small type. A single mass of body matter will contrast better with display lines and white space than will several small masses of body type. Plenty of white space between the black and gray masses will make these masses more prominent than they would be if the white space were scattered throughout the advertisement.

8. In order to please the eye, the display should be well balanced and harmonious. Grotesque arrangements of the various display elements should be avoided. They may attract the eye by their novelty, but they usually lessen the legibility of the advertisement, and the final impression is not pleasing.

Overbalancing of any of the three colors should be avoided; that is, neither the display lines nor the border should be too heavy, and there should not be too much body matter nor too much white space. It is sometimes well to break up large masses of body matter by means of secondary displays or by the use of white space. In this way it is possible to prevent the impression of tediousness that may be conveyed to the reader by a large mass of compact body type. Care, however, should be taken to avoid producing a scattered effect, as this will not give the proper contrast.

9. In making an advertisement easy to read, both the heading and the secondary display lines will be found of assistance, because, when properly used, they emphasize the important ideas. Secondary display lines may also be used to show where a new idea is to be introduced. The value of white space in making an advertisement more readable lies in the use of margins, space between the display lines and body matter, and spaces between the lines of body matter itself.

10. To make an advertisement easy to grasp, it should be so arranged that the general idea to be conveyed by it will be evident at a glance. To effect this arrangement, the main features of the advertisement should be made prominent, and the heading should be made as bold as is consistent with its length and the size of the advertisement. If the price of the article to be sold is a prominent selling point, it also should be displayed. The firm name may be given some prominence, but, except in large department-store advertising, this part of the advertisement is usually subordinate to the other display. In an advertisement displayed in accordance with these principles, the reader learns at a glance what kind of an article is for sale, its price, and where it may be bought, and if it is something that interests him, he will be encouraged to read the details. Even if he does not always read all the details, the few points displayed have given him a concise summary of the advertiser's message.

GENERAL DISPLAY ELEMENTS

11. In laying out an "all-type" advertisement—one that does not contain an illustration—the ad-writer may make use of seven general display elements: (1) white space, (2) border, (3) heading, (4) subheads, (5) body matter, (6) prices, and (7) signature and address. These seven elements may be used in all classes of advertisements, but frequently one or more of them are omitted.

USE OF WHITE SPACE

12. White Space as a Background.—The simplest way to treat the white space in an advertisement is to consider it as a background on which the other elements of the advertisement are arranged. The important features of the advertisement should be emphasized by the contrast between the black and the white. The less important features, the minor displays and text matter, should be gray contrasted with white. The body type should be subordinated so that it will not detract from the strength of the display. In this way, all the features will be made to harmonize, and the important points will stand out prominently with due regard to their relative importance, the whole resulting in a pleasing effect.

Display and body type should not be crowded against each other or against the border, but should be separated so as to leave the proper amount of white background showing through. This will sharpen the contrast between the display and body portions and will give the entire advertisement a more readable appearance.

Care should be taken, however, not to leave too much white space between the several parts of the advertisement, as this will make the advertisement appear disjointed and weak; besides, when white space costs from $1 to $50 an inch, it must be used economically. The white space between the upper border and the top display should never be less than the white space between the top display and the following body matter.

13. Margin.—Technically speaking, the margin of an advertisement is a strip of white space extending entirely around the type matter, between it and the border. The width of the regular margin may be determined by measuring the space from the end of the longest type line to the side border.

When a number of lines of even length are set in a narrower measure (a printer's term meaning "a shorter line") than the other type, thus increasing the regular margin, that portion is said to be indented, or held in.

By referring to Fig. 4, it will be seen that the regular margin is about 12 points, because the W in "Walkaway" of the second line of the heading, which is the longest line of the advertisement, is separated from the border by about 12 points of white space. The body matter, however, is set just 9 picas wide and therefore has a total margin of almost 2 picas, the 2-point border on each side taking away 4 points. The eleven words displayed in the center are held in, or indented, 12 points more.

NOTE.—Not all the advertisements reproduced in this Section are examples of superior copy. The object of the examples is to make the principles of display clear.

14. Purpose of the Margin.—The margin of an advertisement corresponds with the mat of a picture, separating the type picture from the border. If handled skilfully, it aids greatly in securing proper contrast.

15. Indenting.—Setting the type in a narrower measure, or indenting, as it is called, serves to increase the effect of the margin by leaving white space where it is needed, and also to attract the attention of the reader. Display lines are often made more prominent by having them project out over indented body matter, as in the advertisement shown in Fig. 4.

16. Proper Width of Margins.—The amount of margin that should be used depends on the character and size of the advertisement. A closely set advertisement, with little white space between the lines, requires less margin than a light, or open, advertisement. If the border is light, not so much white margin is needed as where a heavy, dark border is used. In mail-order advertisements, where much matter must be set in small space, and in department-store advertisements arranged in panels, the margins should be narrow. In other classes of retail advertisements and in general and trade-paper advertisements, liberal margins are often advisable.

The margin of an advertisement should appear to be evenly distributed all around the type matter. When there is a short display line at the extreme top or at the extreme bottom, there may be a less space between the line and the border, because the extra white space at the ends of this short line will make the margin appear equal to the side margins. For an example of this principle, see the display of the word "The" in Fig. 4 and the short address line; observe, also, how the address line in Fig. 6 is placed nearer the lower border without apparently reducing the margin.

17. Exceptionally Wide Margins.—Where most of the other advertisements on a page are set solid, a strong contrast can be secured by using a band of white space, or margin, between the type and the border. The eye will be immediately attracted by the white space. Fig. 5 shows an advertisement in which the use of bands of white space gives stronger contrast. This style of display is commendable only in cases where the advertiser can buy space cheaply and has little text matter to use.

BORDERS

18. Generally speaking, a border may be used in any advertisement smaller than one page of the publication in which it appears. The border serves to separate the advertisement from surrounding matter and to unite the various elements of the advertisement into one pleasing whole, thus

THE average man in these days is too busy to keep informed as to the details of correct style; but he realizes that it pays to have that kind of clothes; and that's the kind he wants.

He knows fairly well what suits him in pattern and weave of fabric; he can tell by the mirror and the obliging friend if "it fits." But the average man takes his style in clothes as he takes his law or his medicine—on somebody else's advice.

Now, we're in the "style business"; we know and produce the correct style often far ahead of other makers, and even of custom tailors. We put our name and label on our product, not simply as an identification, but as an assurance. When you see that label you may be sure of correct style; of careful, honest, high-class tailoring; of all-wool fabrics; and not a suspicion of the mercerized-cotton cheat.

Better have our label to rely on; it's a small thing to look for, a big thing to find giving a finished appearance. Sometimes even so large an advertisement as a full newspaper page is improved by a border. The border perhaps does more to give shape and individuality to an advertisement than any other display element. Compare the advertisements shown in Figs. 2 and 3 and note the improvement made by the addition of a border.

19. Methods of Using Borders.—The simplest way to use a border is to run it entirely around the advertisement, having the corners square, as shown in Figs. 6 and 7; but this arrangement is in such common use that even a slight deviation from it usually gives the advertisement more prominence. The mere substitution of round for square corners, as in Fig. 4, will sometimes make an advertisement stand out more conspicuously, because of the contrast of the curved border with the square-cornered space in which the advertisement appears. Even beveled corners, like those in Fig. 5, give a little distinctiveness. A few more variations in arrangement of borders are shown in Figs. 8, 9, 10, and 11. Many others can also be seen in the various exhibits of this Section.

Fig. 8 shows a double-rule border broken at both sides so as to allow display lines to project through. This border is made of 4-point and 1-point rule. In carrying out an arrangement of this kind, a band, or margin of white space should be left outside the border, in order to emphasize the effect and add still further to the prominence of the advertisement. Of course, this somewhat reduces the available space inside the border. Fig. 9 shows the same idea applied to an advertisement in which the main display is in the center.

Fig. 10 illustrates a border arrangement that is very effective when the heading is composed of two short lines—the second shorter than the first—and both lines are set in type of large size.

Fig. 11 shows an advertisement with partial border effects. Such display plans are most effective when parallel

A Novel of Mystery

"Armitage" deals with a political intrigue involving a scion of Hapsburg, a young American girl, and two United States army officers as the chief characters. The plot is complicated in the extreme. The political methods of medieval and modern Europe are matched against the brains and strategy of the American soldiers.

Armitage

Armitage has not a single dull page. From the very beginning the plot holds the reader's attention with a fascination seldom aroused by a novel. John Armitage is a character whose resources are limitless, while the Count Bornso has the training of a Vienna Court behind him. There is no forecasting the sequel. At one moment Armitage seems utterly checkmated by the wily count, only to achieve by his strategy a complete reversal of his fortunes. For sale by all book stores. Price, $1.50.

arrangements should be made only of plain, rugged, or parallel rule. Ornamental borders, unless continuous and much like rule borders, do not lend themselves well to anything but the common arrangement, in which the border is run entirely around the advertisement.

Plain-rule borders are stronger and more dignified than ornamental borders. At the same time, an ornamental border often contrasts well with an all-type advertisement and relieves its severity somewhat. If most of the advertisements in a publication are set with plain borders, an advertisement surrounded by an ornamental border will stand out well, because of the contrast. Ornamental borders sometimes add an artistic effect that plain borders do not give. Ornamental borders, unless very small or almost plain, are likely to detract from the strength of an illustration, though if the selection is carefully made it is possible to use a harmonious ornamental border that will add to the strength of an illustration. Ornamental borders must be used very judiciously, and, if there is any doubt as to what style of border to use, a plain- or parallel-rule border of appropriate width should be specified. Such borders can be used with propriety and with good results in advertisements of any character.

21. Sizes of Plain-Rule Borders.—For the smaller advertisements, 1-, 2-, 3-, 4-, and 6-point rule borders may be effectively used. For double-column and larger advertisements, 12-point, plain-rule borders may occasionally be used, but ordinarily, 6-point is heavy enough. A 12-point, plain-rule border on a single-column newspaper or magazine advertisement would look too heavy. Most printers can furnish round corners for any of these rules. An exhibit of plain-rule borders is shown in Type and Type Measurements, Part 1.

There is a margin of nearly 2 picas between the body matter and the border

22. Parallel-Rule Borders.—Borders consisting of two rules of equal thickness placed side by side, as in Figs. 6 and 7, are called parallel-rule borders. Such borders form a pleasing variation from plain-rule borders, and may be used when a lighter, more open effect is desired. The remarks in the preceding paragraph as to sizes of borders to use, apply in a general way to parallel-rule borders, although the lighter effect of the latter should be taken into consideration. Few printers have round corners for parallel rules. (See Type and Type Measurements, Part 1, for an exhibit of parallel-rule borders.)

Light parallel-rule borders with lines of equal thickness are extensively used in high-grade magazine advertisements, where they are very effective. Fig. 12 shows a magazine advertisement with a light, 4-point, parallel-rule border. This advertisement is an example of an artistic style of setting and the free use of white space.

23. Double-Rule Borders.—If the printer does not have double rule, two plain rules may be used side by side as a substitute. Combinations of rules of different faces, with 2, 4, or 6 points of white space between them, are effective for double-column and larger advertisements. The border used in Fig. 8 is made up of 4-point and 1-point rules. The border in Fig. 11 is composed of 12-point and 1-point rules. When so combined, rules can have square corners only. Type and Type Measurements, Part 1, shows various combinations of double-rule borders.

24. Width of Ornamental Borders.—The proper width of ornamental border to use depends largely on the character of the border. If its general effect is light, a 12-point ornamental border may be used even in a single-column advertisement. In fact, the 6-point size of a light-faced border might appear too weak for such an advertisement. So far as its general color effect is concerned, a heavy ornamental border should be treated much the same as a plain-rule border.

25. Paneled Borders.—Individuality—that “different look”—can sometimes be secured by the use of simple panel arrangements of the border. Simplicity should always be kept in mind, however, or the strength of the display plan will be lessened. Small advertisements do not lend themselves to panel effects as a rule, because the panels must necessarily be small; and the subdivision of a small space tends to weaken the whole effect. In advertisements larger than 4-inch magazine column and as large as 3 or 4 inches double newspaper column, panels may be used with good results provided care is taken to preserve strength and contrast. Do not use a panel if it merely cuts off part of an advertisement and makes it appear to be part of another advertisement.

Paneled borders may be arranged with the panels one under the other, as shown in Fig. 13, or side by side, as shown in Fig. 14. Using the border in the manner shown in Fig. 13 gives particular distinction to the heading. Effects like that shown in Fig. 15 are often effective, as they give the appearance of three columns. Panels may be joined as in Figs. 13 and 15, or they may be separated by a narrow strip of white space, and connected by short pieces of rule or by display lines, as in Fig. 14; and so on.

26. Special Borders.—Some advertisers use drawn ornamental borders designed especially for them, as in the advertisement shown in Fig. 16. Such borders, because of their contrast with the ordinary run of borders, usually make an advertisement more prominent. If the same style of border is used continuously, it will give a firm's advertising matter prominence, causing the public to recognize the advertisements at a glance. Many large department-stores use special borders.

27. Curved and Odd-Shaped Borders.—It has been shown that a slight deviation from the common rectangular

Not any substitute for it. Wherever failure to live means financial loss, there is call for insurance. Is your life of financial value to another—your family, partners or business? If so, Life Insurance deserves your attention, and deserves it now. Your forethought will be better than their afterthought. ¶ When it comes to the best kind of Life Insurance, men do not all think alike. There is no desirable kind that cannot be obtained from THE MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY. This is the oldest active Life Insurance Company in America, and the largest and staunchest in the world. It is a Mutual Company. It has no stockholders. Its assets belong to its policy-holders. has done as well for its policy-holders as any company. It should have done better, as has recently been shown. Under the present management all policy-holders may expect unusually favorable results. This is made reasonable by the facts that it is a strictly Mutual Company, operated under New York laws, which are now the best in the world; that its great volume of business means smaller share of expense on each policy, and that the new methods and economies, which are now a part of its constitution, will save immense sums which must go to the policy-holders, as the only proper place.

¶ Mr. Charles L. Hughes, who became famous by conducting the investigation of the Legislative Committee, and who speaks with authority, has recently said: "We have had great companies exposed to close and unimpaired analysis, only to find that their solidity was as the rock of Gibraltar. I would rather take insurance in a New York company compelled to transact business under these restrictions, than in any company not so restricted, and I believe that will be the sentiment of the people of these United States."

factory results in producing such advertisements are secured by having the odd-shaped borders drawn and engraved, and then having the type inserted in the mortise left in the engraved plate. For Whom Is Life Insurance?

It is not for the rich, nor the independent, nor the selfish. It is for the man who recognizes responsibility; for the man who will discriminate—who will take the money he needs for other things and put it in Life Insurance because he sees that the protection of his loved ones after his departure is the greatest need of all. Such a man is worth insuring, and such a man should be sure of his insurance.

designs in the shape of diamonds, ovals, circles, etc., with type breaking through the border, or to ask them to join borders to illustrations. Few printers are equipped for such work, and even if they consent to try it, the result will usually be disappointing and not nearly so effective as a drawn border. If the advertisement is not to be changed, the type may be set in the mortise of a drawn border, and the whole design can then be electrotyped in quantities and sent to any number of publications, thus insuring an exact reproduction of the advertisement in all of them. It should be remembered, however, that all mortises with slanting sides, such as cuts like Figs. 21 and 22 have, give the printer extra trouble.

HEADINGS

28. The heading of an advertisement is the typographical guide post to the reader's eye, and it should therefore be a strong typographical feature. A heading is not nearly so conspicuous or impressive when several other parts of the advertisement in type of the same or almost equal strength are clamoring for recognition.

As bold an effect in the heading as is consistent with the length and size of the advertisement should be sought. Small type should be avoided, as it will not afford sufficient contrast to the body matter and will prevent the reader from grasping the meaning of the heading quickly. In magazine advertisements that are only about an inch deep, large type cannot be used if the heading consists of three or four words, but, as a general rule, if the space is small, it is better to cut down the descriptive matter than to weaken the heading by setting it in type that is too small. In other words, an effort should be made to have the main display as bold as if the advertisement were much larger.

29. Sometimes a strong effect can be obtained by running a small display at the top of the advertisement and the main display in the center. When this plan is followed, the advertisement should be well balanced and the center display should stand out stronger than the other displays. The display in Figs. 9, 17, and 18 afford good examples of this style.

Care should be taken to see that the heading has a background of white space and that it is not crowded too close to the border or the body matter. In either case, it loses strength. Fig. 24 shows an advertisement that is weak because of the way in which the display lines are set and the crowding of the matter close to the border. Fig. 25 shows the same advertisement properly displayed. The value of proper display and effective distribution of the white space is apparent at a glance.

A study should be made of the headlines of newspaper articles. In such headings the gist of an article is cleverly presented in a few words, and they should serve as an inspiration in writing headings for advertisements. It is much easier to read a heading consisting of a few words than to read a whole sentence set in heavy display type; besides, a short heading can be set in larger type and be given more prominence than a long one. Observe the heading in Fig. 25. This advertisement could scarcely be passed without the words "Automobiles Stored and Repaired" catching the eye.

30. Proper Type for Headings.—A type that can be read at a glance—an attractive, clean-cut, strong, plain letter—should be used for headings. As a rule, ornamental type is ineffective for headings, and weakens the whole advertisement. Ornamental type like a text letter can be appropriately used only in cases where there is some association between the type and the article advertised, but these instances are very rare. Sometimes, where it is desirable to have a distinctive style of letter in order that a name may be impressed on the public, it is necessary to have the name hand-drawn. The word "Nabisco" in Fig. 16 is hand-drawn.

31. Extra-Condensed Type in Headings.—The use of extra-condensed type should be avoided in headings, as it is hard to read, and lacks the strength of condensed and medium display letters.

32. Grotesque Effects in Headings.—Headlines set in a slanting direction, that is, with one end of the line higher than the other, and those set in the form of a decided curve are hard for the printer to arrange and they cause loss of time and extra work. It is also advisable never to have a heading set so that the letters follow directly under one another, as such an arrangement causes the reader to spell out the words or to turn the page around in order to read. Such arrangements are neither original nor clever, and merely result in making the advertisement less easy to read.

33. Non-Centered Headings.—Figs. 26 and 27 show headings with display lines set on the left, a convenient method when the lines are of such length that a good balanced effect is possible. This style may be used for a heading of two lines or of several lines. Very short lines made up of words like "on," "a," etc. should be avoided in this style, as they tend to weaken the general effect.

34. "Step" Headings.—The "step" heading, Fig. 28, can be used to advantage in any but single-column advertisements, in which it is likely to appear crowded. The lines of such a heading should be about the same in length, and they should overlap each other well, so as to prevent a straggling effect.

35. Centered Headings.—Figs. 4, 10, and 18 show graded headings that are centered; that is, the center of each display line coincides with the centers of the others. This arrangement is satisfactory for two or more lines, provided they are of the proper length, but when they are of about the same length, the effect is not so good.

Fig. 29 shows a balanced centered heading. This effect, of course, cannot be secured with fewer than three lines. A common variation of this style is a heading having the middle line shorter than the other two instead of longer.

"The Watch That's Majority."

It is second nature when thinking of watches to think of ELGIN. Accuracy, reliability, durability—all these attributes of a perfect watch are expressed by this one word—ELGIN.

The name ELGIN stands for various grades of watches—varying according to the number of jewels, character of materials and workmanship entering into the construction.

The ELGIN in particular that we mention is the G. M. WHEELER Grade Movement. This designates an ELGIN of popular price—"The Watch That's Made for the Majority." A 17-jewel, finely adjusted movement which can be had in the various sizes for men's and boys' use, and in the models now so popular. Ask your jeweler to show it to you.

$40 China Sets Reduced to $32 this Week

Genuine Shailer, 100-Piece Dinner Set of a new and handsome shape in pure translucent white, delicately decorated. Made only by Louis Shailer, of Limoges, France. This ware is very thin, light in weight, strong, perfect in color and finish, beautiful in decoration. The design consists of a very delicate pink wild crab-apple blossom with light-green moss fern background. It has the genuine French gold nobs and handles, adding richness to the set. We have not used an illustration of this beautiful ware, as a newspaper cut could not do it justice. It must be seen to be appreciated. Each set is packed by expert packers and we guarantee against breakage in delivery.

The set consists of 12 soup plates; 12 plates, 8½ inch; 12 plates, 6½ inch; 12 cups; 12 saucers; 12 individual butters; 12 fruit plates; 1 platter, 14-inch; 1 platter, 16-inch; 1 baker; 1 round, covered dish, 2 pieces; 1 oval covered dish, 2 pieces; 1 pickle dish; 1 covered butter dish, 3 pieces; 1 sugar bowl, 2 pieces; 1 cream pitcher; 1 sauce boat, 2 pieces. These sets were low-priced at $40; unusual bargains at $32. Only 18 sets on hand.

may be overcome by letter spacing; that is, inserting spaces between letters to make them fill out the measure, as in the top line of Fig. 12. As a general rule, however, condensed type should not be letter-spaced, as the spacing reduces strength and legibility. Use a regular face instead.

37. Panel Headings.—A panel heading is made by running a single or a parallel rule around the heading, and either joining the panel to the border, as in Fig. 30, or setting it the same measure as the body of the advertisement within the border, as in Fig. 31. This latter style is very effective when “square” effects, as in Fig. 32, are desired, because the panel squares up the top of the advertisement. Fig. 32 in its original size was 33 picas by 48 picas. It is set in the style of the text pages of the magazine. The border used is a special 6-point border possessed by few printing offices. If this advertisement had not begun with an A, the initial would have been unsuitable, for it would throw the first letter of a word too far away from the remaining ones set in caps.

38. Unusual Locations for Headings.—While in most cases the heading is placed at the top of an advertisement, distinctive display effects may be secured by placing it lower down, as shown in Fig. 33. The chief objection to such a heading is that the eye is first attracted by the lower display line and then has to go back to the top of the advertisement to make a beginning. In an advertisement of ordinary size, however, this objection is not a serious one. When this style is to be used, the main display should as a rule consist of the name of the article advertised. See also Figs. 11 and 17. Fig. 33 will stand close study, as it shows methods of using heading, subheading, side heading, the breaking of border to give extra space for illustrations, and the use of white space between paragraphs. The paneling off of the heading of this advertisement was a detriment.

As a change from ordinary headings, it is sometimes advisable to place the heading in an unusual position, either in the upper left-hand corner of the advertisement, as in Fig. 26, or to the left of the body matter, as in Figs. 27 and 34. These advertisements attract the eye on account of the odd positions of the headings. Fig. 34 is particularly strong on account of the prominence of the heading, which,

A VIGOROUS VETERAN

Fifty-Seven Years on the Road

SALESMAN who spends fifty-seven years on the road must know his business. He must have been a success to have made the same territory and sold the same general line of goods year after year; but that's what a good old salesman, called THE OHIO FARMER, has done and is doing to day.

He has certainly proved to be steady and energetic and enough of a good fellow to hold his friends fast for fifty-seven years.

Selling goods in the same territory since 1848 speaks well for the territory as well as the salesman.

Now, what do these years signify?

First—That the salesman is always welcomed. Second—That his friends have confidence in him and confidence in the goods he sells them. Third—That his customers want his goods; that he profits and his employers profit through him. Fourth—That they have the money and that they spend it.

THE OHIO FARMER reaches a territory in which farming is a paying industry on account of the adaptability of the soil and the readiness with which it grows all farm products. It is rich, and the grade of grains and vegetable products is of the first class and brings a ready market and top-notch prices to the farmer, for this territory is grid-ironed with railroads leading direct to the great markets and, as the country round about is also rich in manufacturing interests, his local market can always be relied upon to take care of his larger crops.

The farmer, himself, is a thrifty person and makes the best of his advantages.

His home has many city comforts. He has pianos, telephones, vehicles of various kinds for different members of the family. Many have automobiles, bicycles, and other things classed as luxuries.

Now, while his farm is resting under its blanket of snow, he has the time to read, and it is only natural that he reads his favorite farm paper even more carefully than he can during the busy season, and THE OHIO FARMER is the favorite farm paper in this rich, prosperous territory.

THE OHIO FARMER was established in 1848. It is going into 100,000 of these well-to-do homes. It is positively necessary to the farmer. He can not do business without it. He naturally has confidence in it and in everything in it. This paper's circulation is paid-in-advance, and there are no dead names carried on its mailing list.

The publishers of THE OHIO FARMER, (The Lawrence Publishing Company, of Cleveland, Ohio,) realize the value of honesty with their subscribers and advertisers, and their present large paid circulation and the ample representation of the most successful business houses and manufacturers in the country, in their advertising columns, stamps this policy as, not only the best morally, but the most profitable from a practical business standpoint. They have, in this manner, held the trust of their old friends and are daily gaining that of new ones.

Now, the farmer is the mail-order buyer of this country and the list of mail-order advertisers in THE OHIO FARMER would make it appear that they considered their space a profitable investment.

The theory that fifty-seven years in business is a guarantee of quality and power is all right, but the proof of the quality and power of THE OHIO FARMER is in the "key" to your advertisement, and THE OHIO FARMER desires and requests that you "key" each piece of copy you send. THE OHIO FARMER reaches 100,000 farmers' homes each week and reaches, probably, 500,000 persons, all of whom have money to spend. Look over your list and see if it is there.

excellent example, showing a list of subjects and containing spaces for name and address of the inquirer.

39. Single-Line vs. Several-Line Headings.—Single-line headings are best adapted to advertisements that are wider than they are deep. In advertisements that are deeper than they are wide, the single-line heading is likely to appear crowded against the top of the advertisement, unless the line is so short that an unusually large size of type may be used.

Headings that contain two or more lines may be used in nearly any advertisement provided they do not take up enough space to overbalance the remainder of the advertisement. The deeper the advertisement, the more lines may be used in the heading. A 12-inch, single-column advertisement, for instance, would look well with a four-line heading, while a 6-inch advertisement with the same kind of heading would appear crowded and have the appearance of being top heavy. The page magazine advertisement shown in Fig. 33 has a four-line heading. Headings containing more than two lines should always be set in upper and lower case, as successive lines of caps are hard to read. Fig. 35 shows a 4-inch, single-column advertisement, with a three-line heading set flush to the left side, each line being shorter than the one above it. This heading would be harder to read if the three lines were of the same length.

When a heading must be divided into two or more lines, it should be so divided as to present the most readable appearance. A heading like "The Only Way to Keep Flies Out" is taken in by the eye instantly when divided between the third and fourth words and arranged in two lines; in fact, it is more readable when arranged in this manner than it would be in one line, for the eye grasps the two short lines more quickly than it would one long line. This heading is much less readable when divided between the second and third, the fourth and fifth, the sixth and seventh, and arranged in four lines. Compare the two arrangements:

The Only Way To Keep Flies Out

OUT

In the two-line arrangement, each line seems to suggest something; but in the four-line arrangement, the message intended to be conveyed by the heading would probably not be caught by a passing glance. As the heading is the guide post to the advertisement, it should be so arranged that it will be grasped as a whole, and will arrest the attention even when passing under the swiftest glance of the eye.

SUBHEADS, OR SECONDARY DISPLAYS

40. Purpose of Secondary Displays.—Any display lines other than the main display and the firm name and address may be termed a secondary display, or subheading. Secondary displays are used to emphasize important points; to show where a new idea is to be introduced; to serve as headings for the panels or sections of a large advertisement; and to break up what would otherwise be a solid mass of reading matter into two or more smaller body spaces, thus making an advertisement more readable. Advertisements smaller than 4 inches, single column, should rarely have more than one secondary display, although a 2-inch advertisement may have a subhead if it adds to the force of the display (see Fig. 30). Larger advertisements may have more subdisplays, provided there is enough body matter to give good contrast.

41. How to Use Secondary Displays.—Secondary displays may be handled in much the same manner as headings. In advertisements containing panels, the subheads may be combined with panel rules, just as main headings are combined with borders.

The most common methods followed are: (1) To center subheadings either directly under the heading or in separate sections of body matter, as in Figs. 4, 8, 22, and 23; (2) to set them flush to the left, as in Fig. 36; and (3) to set them to a narrower measure than the body type, squaring them to both sides if they make more than two lines, as in Fig. 4, or squaring them with the body matter if the body matter is set to a narrower measure than the heading. Note in Fig. 36 that the two lines of heading and all subdisplay lines are set

42. Run-In Headings.—Sometimes, the subheading of a paragraph or a section of body matter is made a part of the first line. It is then called a run-in heading. The first words of this paragraph, set in bold-faced type, afford an example of a run-in side heading.

Fig. 37 shows an excellent example of run-in headings. In this advertisement a number of features are emphasized by placing the main words in bold face, by running headings in bold face at the beginning of a number of short paragraphs, and by using a hanging indentation for the body matter. The method shown in this example of using two faces of the same type (Cheltenham), one for the display and one for body matter, is to be commended. It preserves the type harmony, and, at the same time, gives a strong contrast. It would have been extremely difficult to secure as strong an effect by any design other than the one used in Fig. 37. This advertisement is reduced from a size 29 picas deep by 41 picas wide.

43. Side Headings.—Another method of using secondary display is shown in Fig. 38. The subheadings shown here are generally known as cut-in side headings. These subheadings are set flush to the left in short lines, one under the other, in a bolder face of type than the body. The general plan for this style of subheading is to place them at the beginning of the paragraph, as in (a), although they are often placed halfway down, with full-measure lines above and below, as in (b).

44. Type for Secondary Displays.—Secondary display lines should be set in strong, bold-faced display type, so that they will contrast well with the body matter. For the same reason, the display should usually be in a larger size of type than the body matter, unless, of course, the contrast between the two faces is very marked. Secondary displays should always be subordinate to the main heading, otherwise the advertisement will have a jumbled appearance. They should be just large enough to give sufficient prominence to each section of the advertisement and yet remain secondary to the main display elements.

In order to secure harmony, the same or a similar face of type should be used for subheadings as is used for the other displays in the advertisement. An exception to this rule is where it is desired to make a panel prominent by using a contrasting style of display type.

BODY MATTER

45. Display type is used to attract attention; body type to give details. Hence, legibility is a prime requisite of body matter. As a rule, Old-Style Roman or Modern Roman, preferably Old Style, should be used for body matter, as it has a light face, is easy to read, and affords strong contrast with display lines. Display type should not be used for body matter unless it has a light face and is easy to read or unless the space is large and there is little text. In any case, display type for body matter must be used with much discrimination. If the printer has such type as Cushing, Cardinal, Caslon, Century, etc., these may be used occasionally for body type as a change from Modern or Old-Style Roman. Such types as Bookman are often very appropriate for the introductory paragraphs of advertisements.

A mass of black body type is hard to read, and prevents proper contrast with the other elements of an advertisement. Fig. 39 shows an advertisement set in bold-faced type, while Fig. 40 shows a resetting of the same advertisement properly displayed. The signature is kept in its original style because of the trade-mark value. Note the increased strength obtained by contrasting the light body matter with the display lines and featuring the article advertised. In Fig. 40 the main display feature of the advertisement is brought out in strong contrast so as to catch the eye. The subsidiary matter is held in to a narrower measure at the top. The display is in Quentell, with body matter in 10-point Old-Style Roman, leaded. A 6-point rule with round corners is used for the border.

46. Leaded vs. Solid Matter.—The use of leaded body matter is advisable when the subject requires an open treatment; it is also advisable when the type must be set in a very wide measure, because the eye would have difficulty in following long lines of solid matter. When printed on good paper, such as is used in most magazines and class papers, solid matter is easier to read than when printed on poor paper like that used in newspapers, cheap mail-order journals, etc. The better grade of paper is white and smooth, so that the type prints clear and sharp, giving a better contrast between the ink and the paper. Under such conditions, solid matter, unless in wide measure, will be very readable. On cheap stock, such as that used for newspapers, the impression is not clear-cut, the ink spreads a little, causing the letters to fill in, and strong contrasts cannot be obtained. In such cases, the matter may be leaded to advantage if the cost of the space permits, but, as a matter of fact, more advertisements are set solid than are set in what is termed a squared effect. Such an advertisement should be set in type of large size—about 14-, 18-, or 24-point Old-Style Roman, Caslon, Old-Style Antique, Cheltenham, or some other very plain type that is easy to read—so the examples shown in Fig. 41.

The matter shown in (a) is set in 6-point solid; that in (b), in 6-point leaded; and that in (c), in 8-point solid.

47. Overleading.—Too much leading is worse than no leading at all, because it gives the body matter a weak, straggling appearance and prevents proper contrast with the black and white portions of the advertisement. It is seldom advisable in ordinary body matter to use leads thicker than 2 points.

48. Advertisements Without Display Lines.—Some advertisements are composed of body matter alone, as shown in Fig. 7. When no display lines are used in an advertisement, plenty of margin should be left around the body matter, so that it will contrast well with the white space and be separated from the surrounding border. For the best effect, the margin should appear to have the same width throughout. This results that the reader can grasp the advertisement quickly and have no difficulty in following it. The chief weakness of this style is that there is no guide post to the advertisement and its nature is not evident at a glance.

49. A slight improvement on the style of advertisement shown in Fig. 7 is one in which the first words, the first line, or the first sentence is set in type slightly larger in size than the rest of the advertisement, as shown in Fig. 42. In the original of this advertisement, the introductory paragraph was set in 30-point Caslon. These lines being larger than the following matter, they served as a heading. The judicious use of white space aids in making this advertisement very readable.

50. Reading-Notice Advertisements.—When it is desired to have an advertisement imitate reading matter, the copy is set up in the same style as the headings and body type of the newspaper in which it is printed. Figs. 43 and 44 show two styles of reading notices, with and without subheads. These are newspaper advertisements. In order to distinguish such advertisements from real news items, they sometimes have a sign at the bottom, such as one or two stars or 1t, 2t, etc. These signs serve as a guide for the printer, and to prevent him from taking the advertisements out with the balance of the reading matter when the forms are changed from one day to another. Fig. 32 shows a full-page, magazine advertisement of this class.

51. Styles of Setting Body Matter.—The simplest way of setting body matter in connection with display lines is shown in Fig. 6. In this case both the heading and the body matter are set to the same measure, there being no indentation until the signature is reached.

Figs. 4, 9, and 10 show advertisements with the body matter indented at both sides, thus affording relief from the otherwise square, "set" appearance, and at the same time sharpening the contrast between the body matter and the other display elements.

CATARRH CAN BE CURED

Kill the Germs by Breathing Hy-o-mei. Gives Quick Relief

Many people who have suffered with catarrh for years naturally feel that the disease cannot be cured, and become discouraged.

Their failure to get relief is due to the fact that they have not used the right remedy. Catarrh is an affection of the head, throat, and lungs, and cannot be cured by stomach dosing.

The only scientific and natural treatment for this disease is Hy-o-mei, which is breathed through a neat pocket inhaler, so that its healing medicated air reaches the most remote air cells, kills all catarrh germs, and restores the mucous membrane of the nose, throat, and lungs to a healthy condition.

We do not want any one's money unless Hyomei gives relief and cure, and we absolutely agree that money will be refunded unless the remedy gives satisfaction.

All druggists should be able to supply you with Hyomei or we will send it by mail on receipt of price, $1, and every package is sold with the distinct understanding that it costs nothing unless it cures. Booth's Hyomei Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

ECZEMA 15 YEARS WITHOUT RELIEF

Friend Recommended Cuticura—Used Five Cakes Cuticura Soap and Two Boxes of Cuticura Ointment and is Entirely Cured —Feels Like New Man.

GLADLY RECOMMENDS CUTICURA TO ALL

"I had eczema for more than fifteen years, and had tried all sorts of remedies to relieve me, but without avail. I stated my case to one of my friends and he recommended the Cuticura Remedies. I bought them with the thought that they would be unsuccessful, as with the others. But after using them for a few weeks I noticed to my surprise that the irritation and peeling of the skin gradually decreased, and finally, after using five cakes of Cuticura Soap and two boxes of Cuticura Ointment it disappeared entirely. I feel now just like a new man, and I gladly recommend these remedies to all who are afflicted with skin diseases. David Blum, Box A, Bedford Station, N. Y., Nov. 6, 1905."

Little Son Had Eczema

"My son when four years of age had eczema on his body and limbs and suffered badly. Cuticura Remedies were recommended to me and I gave the complete treatment a trial and at the end of the third month my son was cured. I cannot say too much in praise of Cuticura Remedies and am always ready to recommend them to others. Mrs. G. H. Conant, Box 811, Rockland, Mass., Dec. 14, 1905."

Helpless Infants cured of Torturing, Disfiguring Humors, Eczemas, Tetters, Rashes, Itchings and Irritations owe more to Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment than to all other remedies combined. No others so pure, so sweet, so speedily effective. May be used from birth.

Complete External and Internal Treatment for Every Humor of Infants, Children, and Adults consists of Cuticura Soap (25c.) to cleanse the skin, Cuticura Ointment (50c.) to heal the skin, and Cuticura Resolvent (50c.) (in the form of Chocolate Coated Pills, 25c. per vial of 60.) to purify the blood. Sold throughout the world. Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props., Boston, Mass.

A feature section from a large department-store advertisement, showing use of main heading and subheading; price display; and special panel within the large panel, featuring one special article more than the others in the section. The double display lines are set in 'Blanchard Condensed, with 2-point rule around the outside, and 6-point parallel rule around the lace panel. Main introduction in 12-point Old-Style Roman; subintroductions in 10-point; descriptions in 8-point

52. Body Matter in Columns.—In a narrow advertisement the body matter should be set in a single column, but in a wide advertisement, particularly if there is much text, the body space should be divided into two or more columns. This arrangement, by having a width of line that the eye can easily follow, not only makes the body matter more readable, but also adds to the attractiveness of the advertisement. See Figs. 15 and 32. This idea is also frequently followed in the panels of a large advertisement, as shown in Fig. 45, which illustrates a section taken from a department-store advertisement. The introductory matter in such advertisements is usually set in as wide a measure as the panel will allow, and the following matter, which generally contains lists and descriptions of items, is divided into two or more columns. Very narrow measures should be avoided, because they sometimes make it necessary for the printer to space out some words in order to make them come flush with the right-hand side of the measure, and this spacing lessens legibility.

53. Odd-Shaped Body Spaces.—It is frequently necessary to depart from the square-cornered effect of the ordinary body space in order to fit the type matter (1) around an illustration, as in Fig. 33; (2) into an irregular-shaped border, as in Fig. 21; or (3) into a circular panel, as in Figs. 17 and 18. However, in general, the rectangular shape of the setting should be followed. It is better to avoid such shapes as stars, crosses, etc. Such settings may be interesting as curiosities, but they are hard to read and detract attention from the message of the advertisement. In addition, they cause the printer a great deal of trouble and extra labor. It is easy enough to get up such unusual shapes as an electric-light globe for an electric-light advertisement, and if the side of the mortised cut is not too slanting, type may be set in it without much trouble, but cuts mortised with decided curved edges are very troublesome.

54. Displaying Lists of Subjects.—Where it is necessary to use long lists of subjects, or articles, without descriptive matter, the copy is usually set in narrow columns, each article, or subject, occupying a line by itself, and the line being set flush to the left. This method gives greater strength than where the matter is set in regular paragraph form, as the eye can run down such a list more easily. Lists are usually set in type that is at least 2 points smaller than the body type used in the advertisement. If the body matter, for example, is in 8-point, the lists should be set in 6-point—solid, if necessary—as shown in Fig. 46. Type with a face somewhat heavier than the body type can often be effectively used in such cases.

55. Gradation of Body Type.—Frequently the space to be occupied by an advertisement is too small for a large size of type to be used throughout. In such cases, rather than set the entire advertisement in small type, the first part may be set in a large size and the following matter in a smaller size or sizes. In small advertisements, the first paragraph only may be set in the larger size. In a large advertisement, the main introduction might be set in 14-point, for instance, while the principal matter in each section of the advertisement is 10-point, with the remainder in 8-point.

Usually, it is not advisable to use more than two sizes of type for body matter. In any case, there should be a noticeable contrast between the sizes used; that is, it is better to have a difference of two points rather than a difference of one point. Fig. 47 shows the gradation of body matter in a page magazine advertisement. In this advertisement it will be well, to note the method of displaying the statement at the top in inverted-pyramid style; that is, one line under the other and each line shorter than the one preceding it.

56. Extra Space Between Paragraphs.—Where it is necessary to set an advertisement solid, or to set a large amount of body matter unbroken by subheads, the eye will be materially aided if there is a little leading between the paragraphs. This plan has several advantages; it rests the eye, it breaks up a solid mass of small type, and where

While the Gammeter Multigraph is designed primarily for the rapid production of original typewritten letters, in multiple quantities, it is equally well adaptable for many other kinds of multiple work.

Users of the Multigraph are constantly discovering new uses for it, until now we have a list of over 125, some of which are given in the column at the left.

This list is not imaginary or theoretical; every item mentioned being given us by some Multigraph user who has found the machine a money-maker and a money-saver in actual service.

The Gammeter Multigraph, operated by an office boy or girl, not only will produce typewritten letters at the rate of 2,000—and over—an hour, that are indistinguishable from personally dictated letters, but it saves many printer's bills, as the list on the left gives evidence.

The Multigraph takes paper and cards of any weight from the size of a postage stamp to a full foolscap sheet. It takes up no more room than an ordinary typewriter, and is operated on the same principle, using typewriter type, and printing through a wide typewriter ribbon on paper backed up by a typewriter platen. Electrotypes can also be used upon it, and a direct inking attachment is supplied for work not requiring actual typewriting.

A full-page, magazine advertisement, showing very liberal use of white space, obtained by indenting the body matter. The first paragraph was originally set in 12-point De Vinne, the second in 10-point Old-Style Roman, and the third and the fourth in 8-point Old-Style Roman. The display lines are in De Vinne and the border is 3-point rule with round corners. Reduced from a size 33 picas by 49 picas necessary, it divides the paragraphs of body matter into individual units, thus materially strengthening them. Figs. 23 and 33 show various ways of using extra leads, or white space.

PRICE DISPLAY

57. Size of Price Figures.—When the price of an article offered for sale is a prominent selling point, it should be displayed, but where space is limited, or where the price is a minor selling point, it may simply be run in with the body matter. Where the price is a strong selling point of a simple advertisement, it should be considered as a general display element; but in a complex advertisement, the price figures should be regarded as minor elements.

Some ad-writers give the price too much prominence, forgetting that there is a difference between figures and price. Standing alone, 98¢ means 98 cents and nothing more; but 98 cents may be a high price or a low price for a certain article. The figures are not a price unless they are considered in connection with the article for sale; and if the price figures are much larger than the display that tells what the article is and the eye takes in price figures but not the nature of the article, nothing is gained. Therefore, generally speaking, price figures should not be stronger than the display or displays that inform the reader about the nature of the article.

58. Location of Price Figures.—The proper location for the price figures varies. Sometimes it is an effective plan in retail advertisements, if the price is a strong point, to place the price in the center of the advertisement, or panel, as in Fig. 8, thus securing the proper amount of white space around the figures. Then, again, to save space, the price may be placed in the lower right-hand corner of the body space, as in Fig. 6. This location is a favorite one.

Styles of price displays that are particularly good for items in a panel of a large advertisement are shown in Figs. 48, 49, 50, 51, and 52. The style shown in Fig. 49 is good where

A panel from a department-store advertisement showing use of a triple, light-faced 6-point border with round corners. Schaeffer Old Style was used for display with 10-point and 6-point Lining Cushing for body matter space is at a premium. The size of type used for this style of price figure may be the same as that for the text or in some cases a little larger; having a black face, it will be more prominent. The price figures in Fig. 53 seem a little large, but in the original large advertisement, the main head over a number of panels told that they all offered underwear.

In large panels where several grades of the same article are offered at various prices, the price figures may precede the descriptions, as in Fig. 54, or follow them, as in Figs. 48, 49, 50, and 53; they are often arranged vertically in numerical order, the lowest price at the top. The panel shown in Fig. 54 is a style often used in full-page, department-store advertisements. In addition to showing prices preceding descriptions of articles, as just stated, this panel shows how the price may be brought out in headings. The introductory matter is set the full width of columns, with descriptive matter divided into two columns under it. The item portion of this panel, however, would have been rendered more readable by placing a lead between each paragraph.

If the price is the chief selling point, it may either be displayed in the heading or precede the description as in Figs. 28 and 51. In cases like this, the price may be printed in exceptionally large type so as to attract the eye and appeal to the pocketbook, as in the advertisement shown in Fig. 55. If the article is not well known, or is salable only after a desire for it has been created, the price figures should appear after the description and should not be displayed.

If the selling price is considerably lower than the usual price, it is well to display them close together, as in Figs. 28 and 29, so that the reduction will be more apparent.

tional matter, such as telephone numbers, etc. Some advertising men, particularly those in the department-store field, think that the firm name should appear at the top of every advertisement, believing that the readers of newspapers will look for the announcement of their favorite store to learn what it is offering. But in a small or a medium-sized advertisement, there is no necessity for placing the signature at the top, as the heading and signature would be seen at almost the same instant. In a large advertisement this might not be the case; hence, the top location in such an advertisement has something in its favor.

One serious objection to placing the name at the top of an advertisement is that unless it is carefully displayed, the name will overshadow the real heading. Some retail advertisers, in order to avoid this bad feature and yet retain any possible advantage of the top location, use a small signature repeated across the top of the advertisement in addition to a large signature at the bottom, as in the advertisement shown in Fig. 56. These column signatures, as they are called, serve to identify the advertisement; yet they do not interfere with the main display.

60. Size of Firm Name and Address.—The firm name should be prominent, as a rule, but it should be sufficiently subordinated to the heading or the main display, so that the latter will lose none of its prominence. In mail-order advertising, where there is a great deal of matter to go into the advertisement, and the space costs from $2 to $7 an agate line, the firm name and the address are often displayed in small type or even run in at the end of the body matter. In such a case, they are usually set in black-faced type. This method is also used in general advertisements for the reason that the article, not being bought direct from the advertiser, his name and address are of small importance, the chief aim being to impress the name of the article or the trade mark on the reader. General advertisers' names are sometimes emphasized, however, because of their trade-mark value.

The retailer advertises his entire store, as well as the goods mentioned in his advertisements, and therefore needs to keep his name and address before the public by displaying them with reasonable prominence in every advertisement.

61. Methods of Displaying Firm Name and Address.—A good general rule to follow in displaying a firm name and address is to make the two together about half as strong in display effect as the principal display in the advertisement, which is usually the heading. See Figs. 4, 6, and 8. There are exceptions to this general rule, however. In mail-order and general advertising there is usually less need for displaying name and address strongly than in retail advertising. Fig. 5, for example, illustrates how small the bottom display is when compared with the heading. The advertisement shown in Fig. 6 makes it clear that a line of 14-point (the name), followed by a short line of 10-point (the address), does not give more than about half the strength of the 30-point heading, though the total of points is nearly the same in both cases. Therefore, in undertaking to make a lower display about half the strength of the top display, it is better to be guided by the display effect than by a calculation of points.

Frequently, the best method is simply to arrange the signature and address one above the other as a centered display. If this will leave too much white space at both sides, a short name and address can be set on one line extending across the bottom of the advertisement, as in Figs. 5, 9, 10, and 14. The various methods of arranging the signature and the address in the exhibits of this Section will serve to bring out a great many styles.

62. Name Plates.—Figs. 57, 58, and 59 show examples of the name plates, or signature cuts, used by many advertisers to give individuality. Fig. 57 shows an example of what is known as a reverse plate; that is, in the drawing, the letters were black against a white background, and the lines near the edge were black; the engraver was instructed to reverse the colors and to make the letters white instead of black and the background black instead of white. This process is often used in order to get a distinctive headline or to get an entire advertisement with white letters against a black background. Sometimes these reverse plates give better display than black letters on a white background. The plate shown in Fig. 57 does this, but very frequently the effect is not so good as the usual black-type arrangement. The effectiveness of the plate shown in Fig. 58 is spoiled by an attempt on the part of the artist to make it too artistic. This name plate is not so effective as a good black letter against a white background would be. Compare Fig. 58 with Fig. 59, which is a strong hand-drawn signature of the usual black-letter style. The strength of the plates shown in Figs. 57 and 59 is due largely to the simplicity of the designs.

BALANCE

63. In arranging the several general display elements, attention must be paid to what is known in printing as balance. By balance is meant a harmonious distribution of the display elements, so as to keep an advertisement from appearing top heavy, bottom heavy, or too strong in display on one side. Some features of balance have already been considered.

An important principle of balance is that the center of display should be closer to the top than to the bottom of an advertisement. By center of display is meant that point in an advertisement which would be the balancing point if the advertisement were a stout piece of cardboard balanced on a pivot, with the chief display lines on it as weights.

If an advertisement has only one strong display element, this display should not be exactly in the center or below it, but a little above the center. Note Figs. 60, 61, and 62. Fig. 60 has a display at the bottom that is not so strong as the top display, but it is enough to keep the advertisement from appearing top heavy. As the top is heavier in display, the center of display will be above the center of the advertisement, which is in accordance with the principle of balance. In Fig. 61, the line "100 for $7.50" is near the name and

Kinetic Energy

"Kinetic" is a good word. It means "power to make things go." A fat bank account, a rock on the edge of a hill, a barrel of gunpowder, and SCOTT'S EMULSION all contain "kinetic energy," so the professor tells us.

Scott's Emulsion

is stored-up power. This force let loose in the system of the consumptive gives him the strength to take on new flesh. It is a powerful flesh-producer.

address, thus bringing the center of display below the middle of the advertisement and making the lower half the heavier; the effect is to throw the advertisement out of balance. If this "100 for $7.50" line is carried back to a position above the center of the advertisement, as in Fig. 62, the balanced effect will be restored.

If it is ever necessary, on account of the arrangement of copy, to put the heaviest display line below the middle of the advertisement, the bottom display should be minimized and a moderately strong top display used, so as to bring the center of display still above the middle of the advertisement. This is clearly illustrated in Fig. 63. If a bottom display as strong as the top had been added to this advertisement, the balance would have been disturbed. If these fundamental principles are observed, superior display will result.

SPACE PROPORTIONS

64. Publishers usually have some rules regarding the proportions of space that they sell to advertisers. Many newspapers, for instance, provide that double-column advertisements shall be at least 42 agate lines deep. But these regulations are few, and the advertiser is left much to his own judgment in deciding in what shape he shall buy his space.

If the advertiser wants as much space as is contained in a 21-inch column of a newspaper, shall he buy a full column, as in Fig. 64 (a), a space $10\frac{1}{2}$ inches long across 2 columns, as in (b), or a space 7 inches deep across 3 columns, as in (c)? If he needs 42 inches of space, shall it be taken 14 inches deep across 3 columns, as in (d), or $10\frac{1}{2}$ inches deep across 4 columns, as in (e)? If he is to use half a magazine page, shall it be a full column, 8 inches deep and $2\frac{5}{8}$ inches wide, as in (f), or shall it be half of the page divided horizontally, that is, a space 4 inches deep by $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, as in (g)? Is a quarter-page magazine space 4 inches deep and $2\frac{5}{8}$ inches wide, as in (h), more to be desired than a quarter-page 2 inches deep and $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, as in (i)?

Of course, the article to be advertised has a bearing on this question of the shape of the space, and in buying space, the advertiser should have regard for the subject of the advertisement. There is no doubt of the fact that a revolver illustration can be shown better in a space like that in Fig. 64 (g), and that the space in (i) lends itself somewhat better to a horizontally placed illustration of an air rifle or a tooth brush than does the space in (f). Sometimes, too, the length and size of the display lines that the advertiser wishes to use should be taken into consideration; and occasionally a certain desired column arrangement requires that the space have a particular form. But when the illustration is not of such character as to require the shape of the space to be especially adapted to it, and there are no other special considerations, the question then is, What proportion of space will afford the most effective display? In newspaper advertising, an advertisement is rarely on a page by itself; it is frequently surrounded by other advertisements, and the ad-writer should take advantage of everything that will help to make his advertisement more prominent.

65. Experiments seem to show that, with the exception of occasions when the particular subject requires space of a special shape, the space shown in Fig. 64 (c) affords better display than either (a) or (b); that the space in Fig. 64 (b) is to be preferred to that in (a); that in (e) to that in (d); and that in (g) to that in (f). The single-column newspaper advertisement seems to lose in effective proportions after going beyond 6 inches in depth; that is, better display effects are possible, as a rule, with a space 4 inches across 2 columns than with a space 8 inches deep and 1 column wide. On the other hand, under ordinary conditions, a 4-inch space 1 column wide seems to have a little advantage over a space 2 inches deep across 2 columns.

Advertisements 2 columns wide appear to have the most effective proportions when they are from 6 to 7 inches deep. Greater depth does not seem to secure proportionately greater value. If more space is necessary to accommodate the text or an illustration, it is better to increase the width than the depth.

Advertisements 3 columns wide appear correctly balanced when they are 9 to 10 inches deep.

A 4-column advertisement needs a depth of 12 inches.

A 5-column width requires a 15-inch depth.

All these conclusions are reached on the assumption that special position will not be bought for the advertisement. If an advertisement occupies a position in the corner of a newspaper, away from all other advertisements and is surrounded on three sides by reading, a space 2 inches deep across 2 columns will show off to better advantage than when surrounded by other advertisements. But as publishers of large newspapers usually refuse to sell spaces of small depth across 2 or 3 columns, the ad-writer will do well to follow, approximately at least, the proportions given in the preceding paragraphs as the most effective ones.

Sometimes, however, the very fact that an advertisement is of unusual shape will make it stand out on a page. Full columns in magazines like the Ladies' Home Journal are purchased with the space in this shape largely because these publishers usually put full columns next to reading matter.

NOTE.—These ideas with reference to space proportions appeared first, so far as is known, in an article published by Printers' Ink. The ideas appear here in modified form.

ADVERTISEMENT DISPLAY

MINOR DISPLAY ELEMENTS

1. Among the small display elements of advertisements may be included panels, coupons, underscore rules, capitals, Italics, initials, paragraph marks, and other miscellaneous elements.

PANELS

2. Panel borders have already been treated among general display elements. Under this heading, therefore, will be considered panels that are used as minor display elements, singly and in groups, in the body of the advertisement.

When many articles are to be described in one advertisement, those which are related to one another are usually collected in one part, or section, of the advertisement, and separated from other groups of articles by a rule border. Such a division of an advertisement is called a panel. The copy within the panel is practically an advertisement in itself, except that the firm signature is omitted.

The ordinary panel is formed by surrounding the type matter with either a 1- or a 2-point rule, as shown in Fig. 1, the various panels sometimes being separated by a liberal margin of white space, as in Fig. 2. Panel headlines may be used to separate the various offerings, as in Fig. 3, thus producing a panel effect without the use of panel borders around the whole section, but the use of white space between panels improves the appearance.

Copyrighted by International Textbook Company. Entered at Stationers' Hall, London

3. Uniformity of Panels.—As a rule, all the panels of an advertisement should be uniform in style of display. A notable exception to this rule, however, is an advertisement like that shown in Fig. 3. In this advertisement the chief characteristic is a lack of uniformity in panel construction

Nearly all Gimbal advertisements are laid out on the unbalanced-panel method of display, the chief advantage of which is the prominence given to the principal panel. Such an arrangement needs a border to hold it together. The subordination of the firm name is extreme. Note that panel effect is obtained without the use of rule around the entire section of the advertisement, and that additional strength is given to headings by enclosing them in panels. This advertisement is finely illustrated

Commendable features are: the illustrated headline and the row of clock dials emphasizing the time-limit feature. All subheadings are set flush to the left, with body matter set in regular paragraph style

THE PHILADELPHIA INDEPENDENT GAZETTE, MONDAY, MARCH 2, 1903

1903 Our Annual Spring Exhibit and Sale This Week 1903

Full-page announcement of a millinery opening. Note Monday bargains in right-hand column, and editorial style of matter in left-hand column. The illustration is suggestive of the subject and will attract attention. Note the various methods of handling subheads and run-in side heads, and the panel effects obtained by use of white space between descriptions of articles discordant panels that would tend to destroy the strength of the advertisement. Not more than two styles of display should be used in the panels of an advertisement.

4. Methods of Grouping Panels.—The grouping of panels in nearly all advertisements may be classified as follows: Vertical, in which the panels are arranged in several vertical columns, as shown in Fig. 4; horizontal, in which they are enclosed in several general horizontal panels, as in Figs. 5 and 6; balanced, in which they are grouped symmetrically with regard to two halves of the advertisement, as in Fig. 7, or around one or more central panels of special importance, as in Fig. 8; and unbalanced, in which they are arranged without regard to either symmetry or balance, the space being simply filled in with panels of varying sizes and styles, as in Figs. 3 and 9.

The choice of a panel arrangement should be influenced by the general scheme of display and the character of the copy. If a large number of departments or items have to be represented in one advertisement, it must necessarily be set in a catalog or a price-list style. The vertical arrangement, Fig. 4, is best adapted to such a purpose, although, when there is not too much copy, a balanced-panel effect is possible. If only a few departments are to be represented, or if all the items can be arranged in three or four general groups, as in an hourly sale advertisement, the horizontal arrangement, Fig. 6, may be used effectively.

5. Giving Prominence to Panels.—There are several ways in which a panel may be made especially prominent. For instance, two offers may be placed in the upper right- and left-hand positions near the main display. (See the panels on each side of the firm name at top of the advertisement shown in Fig. 7.) A strong border that is different from any other in the advertisement, as in Figs. 7 and 10, makes a panel stand out strongly. Either a heavy or a contrasting face of display type will make a panel more prominent than others. For example, when most of the panels are displayed with Post Condensed, a Post Old Style display will stand out from the rest. Large or doubled-leaded type in the body of the panel, as in Fig. 10, will make the panel more prominent than others set in smaller type. An extra-wide margin on the inside of a panel, as in Fig. 11, will give it special prominence. A good illustration will make a small panel more striking. Compare the two rug panels in Fig. 12, and note the prominence of the one containing the illustration over the all-type panel beside it.

6. When Panels Should Not be Used.—In a small advertisement, the use of too many panels will produce a patched and crowded effect. Panel arrangements should not be used if there is a large amount of copy to go into a comparatively small space. In such a case, white space can be used to better advantage to separate the items and to strengthen the display lines. If the various portions of the text are closely connected in meaning, it is often inadvisable to use panels, as paneling may break the continuity of ideas.

UNDERSCORE RULES

7. Underscore rules, as the name implies, are rules that are placed underneath words or lines, as shown in Fig. 13. These rules are usually employed to give emphasis, but in some cases, particularly in displays, they are used to strengthen the type. Suppose, for instance, that there is not enough space to use a large size of a certain font of type for a certain display line. Then, to make the display look stronger, the largest size possible could be used and the type underscored with, for example, a 3-point rule. This is an artifice that should be used only when no other means will give the desired strength of color, for while underscoring gives a greater contrast, it usually detracts somewhat from the legibility. Especially is this true where several consecutive lines of display are underscored.

In exceptional cases, a word or a phrase in the body of an advertisement may be underscored for emphasis. Where underscore rules are used too freely in body matter, a

Here's the Opportunity Are You the Man?

If an employer should say, "I want a man for an important position," would you be the right man?

Opportunities like that are coming constantly to men trained by the International Correspondence Schools, an institution that qualifies men to take advantage of every opening; to command high salaries; to succeed in the best positions.

Employers prefer I. C. S. students because of their training, and are daily applying to the Students' Aid Department of the I. C. S. for men to fill positions of responsibility.

Doesn't it shake you up when you see another fellow pushed ahead—because he is trained—and yourself plodding along in the same poor job at the same low wages?

During March, 403 students voluntarily reported an increase in salary and position as the direct result of I. C. S. training.

Why don't you get in line for a good position? It's the business of the I. C. S. to help you. No matter who you are, what you do, or how little you earn, the I. C. S. comes to you right where you are, at your present work, in your own home, and qualifies you for the good things others will grasp if you don't wake up.

The first step is to mark and mail the coupon. It costs nothing but a stamp and will bring you information and help that will eventually be worth thousands of dollars.

amount of matter so that a larger size of type can be used to secure the necessary strength.

It should be remembered that type set solid cannot be underscored; it is necessary to have space between the lines for the insertion of the underscore rule.

CAPITALS, ITALICS, AND BOLD FACE

8. Capitals should be used sparingly in both display and body matter. Copy set entirely in capitals is harder to read than that set in capital and lower-case letters. Fig. 14 shows a display advertisement set in all capitals. A glance shows that the advertisement is very weak; it is hard to read, lacks character—through absence of contrast—and is displeasing to the eye. Fig. 15 shows the same copy displayed in a conservative way in the same space, while Fig. 16 shows how the copy could be rewritten and displayed in a more popular style. Note that Fig. 16 occupies less space than the other two exhibits.

9. Body matter should never be set entirely in capitals. When it is desired to emphasize any particular word, capitals

The name of the article will now attract attention, as it is distinctly stronger than anything else in the advertisement may be used with good effect because of their contrast with surrounding lower-case letters. Capitals are useful when it is desired to contrast portions of the same display line. They are also used to make a short display line occupy more space; to produce a blacker effect, in order to balance another display line; and to give strength, particularly in the case of a short display line. Capitals may sometimes be used to advantage for a line in which maximum readableness is not an object, such as a well-known signature or the name of a product.

10. Italics.—Some Italic display letters are very readable, and may be used advantageously for either a 1-line or a 2-line head or subhead, as a contrast to other displays in the upright Roman face. An excess of Italic display lines will weaken an advertisement. Fig. 17 shows a half-page, trade-paper advertisement in which the main display is set in six lines of Post Italic. Compare this example with the advertisement as reset in Fig. 18, and see how much better the display is when some of the lines are set in Roman letters. The advertisement shown in Fig. 17 has another glaring weakness. There was no necessity of strongly displaying the top line, "Druggists," as the advertisement appeared in a publication devoted exclusively to druggists. The mass of large Italic type caused by this unnecessary display weakens the whole advertisement. Fig. 13 shows a judicious use of Italic display.

11. Italic letters are sometimes used to emphasize one or two words in a line, the remainder of which is set in Roman. Note the emphasis that the Italic gives to the word "you" in the following line:

What Are You Going to Do About It?

In body matter, Italic is used chiefly for emphasis, or for the name of a newspaper, book, foreign phrase, etc. An excessive use of Italic in body matter should be avoided. Well-written copy, except in rare instances, does not require Italic for emphasis. While one phrase in Italic is strong, an advertisement with a half-dozen single words or phrases in Italic scattered throughout would be weakened, as one would detract from the other.

12. Bold Face.—If particularly strong emphasis is necessary in body matter, especially in mail-order advertisements where space is very valuable, bold-face type of the same size as the body type may be used to emphasize a word

THE A. H. LEWIS MEDICINE CO., St. Louis, Mo.

A very poorly displayed advertisement, with Post Italic used for main display lines. Post Italic is a good letter, but the use of it in six consecutive lines makes a display that is hard to read. The spacing out of two of the lines and the use of underscores make the display still harder to read. The space taken up by two cuts exactly alike could be used to better advantage in strengthening the display. See resetting in Fig. 18

A resetting of the advertisement shown in Fig. 17. Note that one of the cuts has been omitted and that the display has been simplified. The salutatory sentence at the top has been reduced to its proper strength. The top line here is in Post Italic but the other display lines have been changed to Post and Blanchard Condensed, thus giving a pleasing contrast. The superfluous punctuation at the ends of display lines in Fig. 17 has been omitted. The advertisement is now very much stronger and far easier to read. Compare carefully with Fig. 17 and note changes. The copy is used here just as it was in the original advertisement, though it is not particularly good or a sentence. Bold-face type should not be used in paragraph matter if the necessary strength can be obtained in any other way, as type of this character "spots" the body matter and thus destroys its neatness and easy-reading qualities. Fig. 13 shows an effective use of bold-face type for the words "International Correspondence Schools." If bold face is used more than once or twice in the same advertisement, its effect is destroyed through a number of features receiving the same amount of emphasis and none having any particular distinction.

INITIALS AND PARAGRAPH MARKS

13. Initials are survivals of the hand-illuminated books and manuscripts of the days before printing. They are very frequently used in book and job work, and are occasionally used in advertisements with good results, especially in high-grade magazines and trade papers. An advertisement that contains much body type, for instance, or one that is set without a heading, as in Fig. 19, is improved by using an initial for the first word of the opening sentence. Initials not only increase the attractiveness of an advertisement, but also draw the eye to the proper starting point.

The character of an initial should be in harmony with the body matter and should be neither too light nor too dark. A heavy, black initial should never be used with light-faced type, as it will create a discordant, unbalanced appearance. Sometimes a large capital letter of the same series of type used for the displays in the advertisement can be effectively used. The remainder of the word in which the initial appears should be set in capitals of the type used for the body matter. See how "hundreds" is set in Fig. 19.

14. Paragraph Marks.—In old books, instead of indenting paragraphs, a paragraph mark was used to show where a subdivision of the text began. This idea has been revived within the last few years, particularly in work that is intended to be an imitation of old-style printing.

ately in advertisements of colonial styles of goods, of dealers in old books, etc., or in any advertisement where this revival of the antique would harmonize with the tone of the advertising. See Fig. 19. When these paragraph marks are to be used, they should be placed on the layout. If they are only in the copy, the compositor may regard them merely as requests for new paragraphs.

COUPONS

15. Coupons are frequently used in mail-order advertisements, and sometimes in general and retail advertisements. They usually contain the name of the advertiser, a request for a catalog or information, and blank lines for the name and address of the reader. Coupons are set in different shapes and occupy many positions, but they are more often placed across the bottom or in a bottom corner of the advertisement. It is a common method to cut off a corner by using a triangular coupon similar to those shown in Figs. 20 and 21. The square or rectangular coupon (see Fig. 22) can extend across the entire width of the advertisement at the bottom or occupy merely a corner.

Sometimes lists of subjects are contained in a coupon. These subjects are usually arranged in columns, with space for the reader to check off the subject in which he is interested, as shown in Fig. 13.

16. Coupons are seldom used in newspapers, the cheap paper making it difficult to write legibly. They are extensively used in magazines and mail-order papers, however. As space in such mediums is very valuable, the body of coupons is usually set in 5- or 6-point solid. Plenty of space should be left to fill in the name and address on the coupon, as this information is what the advertiser particularly desires. To fulfil its mission properly, the coupon should be placed in a position where it can be easily torn out. A dotted line between the main part of the advertisement and the coupon suggests tearing, and thus creates a desire to tear out the coupon.

It is not safe to use in a magazine page a coupon larger than those shown in Figs. 20 and 21, as the postal officers are inclined to withdraw the second-class mailing privilege from publications that insert advertisements incorporating coupons that look like order blanks. In fact, Fig. 21 is rather large for a standard magazine page.

ADAPTATION OF DISPLAY PRINCIPLES

DISPLAYING SIMPLE AND COMPLICATED ADVERTISEMENT

17. Displaying a Large, Simple Advertisement. A knowledge of the principles set forth in Advertisement Display, Part 1, is all that is required for the displaying of simple advertisements, no matter what the size may be. The specimen advertisements given are either small or of medium size, but the display plans they illustrate may be enlarged to any size likely to be met in practice, without destroying their effectiveness. When enlarging a display plan, it will not always be possible to preserve the exact relation of parts that would be used in a small advertisement, owing to limitations in sizes of types, borders, etc., but the general effect may be maintained.

18. Displaying a Large, Complicated Advertisement.—At first glance, the mere size of the space to be filled and the numerous sections to be planned make the displaying of a large, complicated advertisement seem difficult to the beginner, but all difficulty can be avoided if the following method is used: First, determine the general display effect desired. One or two reduced rough sketches may prove of assistance in getting ideas into definite form. Having settled on a display plan, make a full-sized layout of the general display elements, and thus form the skeleton of the display plan, as it were. Then fill in the small display elements, such as secondary displays, panels, etc., and finally indicate the body spaces.

This method of planning a layout will be made clearer by referring to Figs. 23 and 24. In Fig. 23 is shown a reduced layout of the general display elements of a 4-column, 12½-inch.

house-furnishing advertisement, and Fig. 24 shows the same layout, not so much reduced, with the display elements and body spaces indicated. Of course, in practice, these steps would be made on the same layout sheet, but for the sake of clearness, they are illustrated separately here. A reproduction of the printed advertisement is shown in Fig. 2.

19. Importance of General Display Principles. When making a large layout, the general display principles should always be kept in mind. One section of the advertisement should not be allowed to overpower the others. Simply because the advertisement is large does not mean that a mass of heavy display type should be run across the top and thus make the advertisement look like a circus poster. Two, or at the most, three, lines of large type make a heading heavy enough for a full-page newspaper advertisement—the largest advertisement usually handled.

It is not well to crowd one portion of the advertisement and to spread a small amount of matter over another portion. Care should be taken to adjust each part of the display plan so that it will balance and be in harmony with the rest.

Strive for simple, strong effects. An advertisement is likely to be spoiled by the use of a great many small panels, display lines, and cuts placed without any attempt at artistic arrangement. An attractive, general display effect is a long first step toward securing the interest of the prospective purchaser.

The judicious use of white space is of great importance. Naturally, in an advertisement that must give representation to the fifty or more departments of a large store and advertise hundreds of articles, it will be impossible to use white space as freely as in a simple advertisement. However, by leaving a reasonable amount of white space inside the panel rules, around the display lines, and between the adjoining panels, an open, readable appearance will be secured.

APPROPRIATENESS OF DISPLAY

20. Influence of Article on Display.—The display of an advertisement should be considered with regard to its appropriateness for the article advertised. The ad-writer, so far as possible, should study each article he writes about, with a view to making the advertisement harmonize with it. It is impossible to lay down any fixed rules, but the following suggestions will prove helpful:

1. When advertising articles of an artistic, elegant, or refined character, light, open, artistic display plans are appropriate. Such effects may be produced by employing light-faced types and borders and plenty of white space. Jewelry and cut glass, stationery, books, musical instruments, millinery, etc. should be presented by display plans of this sort.

2. Articles of a more utilitarian and commonplace character, such as clothing, dry goods, furniture, etc., unless laying claim to special artistic merit, require less of beauty and more of strength. Medium-faced types and borders and strong, rather than merely artistic, display plans are appropriate for this class of goods.

3. Hardware, tools, machinery, and similar articles of a heavy and plain nature, should be advertised with bold, strong effects.

4. Advertisements of banks and other financial institutions should be given plain, dignified, well-balanced display that will at the same time carry the idea of strength and conservatism.

21. It should be remembered that a type or a display effect may be at once bold and artistic, and hence appropriate for two dissimilar articles. For example, Post Old Style is a heavy type, but as it possesses considerable beauty it would be appropriate for hardware as well as for more esthetic goods, such as books or pianos.

The more highly educated the readers, the more refined will be their tastes. School teachers, college professors, and other cultured persons might consider glaring and in very poor taste an advertisement that, because of its large headlines and black border, would appeal strongly to persons with less refined tastes. On the contrary, the quiet, artistic advertisement that would meet with the approval of cultured persons would likely have little effect on persons that are uncultured.

22. Influence of "Event" on Display.—The character of the event announced in the advertisement should also be considered. If an Easter sale is to be advertised, the advertisement should be made as artistic and attractive as possible. The announcement of a store opening, being more or less in the nature of a social event, should be artistically displayed, but with a quiet, dignified touch, conveying the impression of formality—the reader on an occasion like this to be a guest, not a customer. In fact, the type and arrangement of society announcements is often copied in advertisements of this nature.

On the other hand, if a January clearance sale or some other cut-price event, crowded with a multitude of price reductions, is to be advertised, much less attention need be paid to attractiveness. The price reductions will cause the advertisement to be read carefully even if it consists largely of lists of items in small type and with little white space.

Sensational announcements, such as unusual bankrupt or fire-sales, and cut-price advertisements admit of somewhat extraordinary display treatment—bold headlines and striking display effects. In such cases, however, extremely glaring effects should be guarded against, because of their cheapening tendency.

23. Influence of Season on Display.—The season of the year also has a bearing on the display of an advertisement. Christmas advertisements, for instance, may be made suggestive of good cheer by the use of attractive display types, holly borders, etc.

DISPLAY AND THE MEDIUM

24. Influence of Medium on Display.—When preparing an advertisement, the ad-writer should keep in mind all points connected with the medium that may affect display. If the medium is a newspaper, a mail-order monthly, or some other publication in which cheap ink and inferior paper are used and little attention is given to the presswork, the contrast between the background of the page and the type matter will not be so marked as in a high-grade magazine or a trade paper in which superior ink and white paper having a smooth finish is used and extreme care is given to the

Part of a magazine advertisement, showing how some publishers stipple and line heavy types and borders to make them print lighter presswork. It is thus evident that bolder display effects will be needed in the former to attract the same amount of attention, unless, of course, plenty of white space is used.

Much better-looking advertisements can be obtained in high-grade magazines than in any other class of publications. Excellent effects can be produced in such mediums by the use of light display types, parallel rules, and light, ornamental borders. In fact, many publications refuse to print advertisements that are black. In such cases, the heavy type and border are stippled or lined, as shown in Fig. 25, by means of an engraver's tool, so that they will print lighter.

25. Individuality in Display Plans.—The general typographical appearance and display plans of the mediums should be studied with a view to originating something different—a design that will have prominence because of its contrast with the general run of advertisements. If most of the advertisements are very black, that is, set up with heavy rule borders and types, strive for a light effect, using either light-face, ornamental or parallel-rule borders, plenty of white space, and medium-weight type faces. If most of the advertisements have narrow margins, an advertisement with a broad band of white space inside the border will stand out well. If panel effects are rare, a strong panel arrangement may be used to good advantage.

INFLUENCE OF AMOUNT OF COPY ON DISPLAY

26. In the displaying of advertisements, two extreme cases are encountered, namely, a large amount of copy that must appear in a comparatively small space, and a small amount of copy that is to be used in a comparatively large space. In the first case may be included most of the advertisements appearing in mail-order and agricultural papers; and in the second, most of the general publicity or reminding advertisements. Other forms of advertising may also be included in these two classes, but mail-order and publicity advertisements should be considered as typical examples.

27. Displaying of Crowded Advertisements.—In a great many mail-order advertisements, an attempt is made to squeeze an illustration, a large heading and a subheading, a long description of the article, and an explanation of the method of marketing into a very small space. The usual result is a decidedly crowded, unattractive advertisement. In most cases, this difficulty can be overcome if correct display principles are adapted to the conditions of the advertisement.

In a crowded advertisement, the amount of white space is usually kept below ordinary limits, and narrow margins and little or no leading prevail. However, there is rarely any need to cut out the white space entirely, as is done in many mail-order advertisements. A 6-point margin can be used in nearly any advertisement, and a small amount of white space can usually be left around displays.

The next concession to be made is with regard to the size of type for the body matter. Small type must be used for body matter. In some instances, the copy may be condensed, but even if this is possible, there will be too much, as a rule, to permit the use of any but small sizes of type. The 5- and 6-point sizes are commonly used. Gradation of the size of type for the body of the advertisement may be taken advantage of in many cases, leading the reader on to the small, closely set body matter by degrees.

28. Larger sizes and heavier faces of display type should be used in crowded advertisements than in ordinary advertisements. It is imperative that the main points of the advertisement stand out by strong contrast. The solid, gray effect of the small, closely set body type and the small amount of white space result in a contrast between black displays and dark-gray body matter, rather than a contrast of black and white or black and light gray. Hence, the type used for displays must be bold and heavy in cut, or it will not contrast well with the body matter. On the other hand, overdisplay should be guarded against by taking care not to use too many subheads nor to emphasize too many words in the body matter.

29. Gothic type is used almost entirely for displaying advertisements in mail-order publications, because it is very legible and may be obtained in many widths, from a very condensed style to medium and extended. If possible, however, some other strong, bold face that is not too extended should be used, as, for instance, John Hancock, John Hancock Condensed, Doric Italic, Quentell, Post Condensed, Roycroft, Schoeffer, Adver Condensed, Cheltenham Bold, and Cheltenham Bold Condensed. The faces of these types are much more artistic than Gothic and improve the appearance of the advertisement, giving it a touch of individuality, yet making it just as strong and readable as Gothic.

30. In many advertisements of mail-order magazines, as in other cases, the price of the article is given too much prominence. The price should seldom be larger than the type used for the heading. As advertised mail-order prices are usually low or special, the price may appear in the heading, on the score of being one of the chief selling points. Many mail-order ad-writers make a practice of placing the price figures on the cut of the article offered for sale. This is usually a poor plan for several reasons. The figures mar the attractiveness of the cut; they frequently cover some of the important details, which the reader of the advertisement would naturally be interested in seeing; and, should it become necessary to change the price, a new cut will have to be made. While it is a good plan to have the price and the illustration near each other, so that their connection will be evident at a glance, better results are ordinarily secured by the use of type figures.

31. Borders are often omitted from mail-order advertisements, probably because the advertiser thinks the space they would occupy might be better devoted to type matter. But a carefully used rule border, up to 6 points in width, occupies little space, and at the same time separates the advertisement from surrounding advertisements and gives it more prominence because of contrast with those having no borders. In addition, a border makes the advertisement itself more attractive by giving it unity and form.

32. Revision of a Mail-Order Advertisement.—In order to make clear the points in the foregoing articles, relating to the displaying of crowded advertisements, the mail-order advertisement shown in Fig. 26 has been revised, with the result shown in Fig. 27.

The upper part of the original advertisement is a jumbled mass of display type. The price figures alone are prominent, and if it were not for the illustration, the reader, at a glance, would have no idea what the advertisement was about.

Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago, Ill.

A resetting of the advertisement shown in Fig. 26. The name of the article now occupies a prominent position, and the advertisement is displayed so as to make the matter easily understood. The addition of a border greatly improves the appearance, and separates the advertisement from others of like character in mail-order publications.

Even with the cut, it is almost a puzzle to find what the different figures mean.

In the revised advertisement, the name of the article is given due prominence and the mass of display type is cut down to just enough words to convey the main idea. The display type is kept as much as possible away from the illustration, which is raised to a more prominent position. The price figures are reduced to a reasonable size, leaving the total price near the illustration as in the original advertisement.

In the original, four styles of type—some of them very inharmonious—are used. In the revised advertisement, several different faces of Gothic are used, thus obtaining harmony and uniformity. In order to relieve the congestion at the top of the advertisement, the line "Six Months' Free Trial" is lowered to the position formerly occupied by "Our Offer." Here, this line is more prominent and is nearer the explanatory matter.

The 6-point parallel rule between the display type and the body matter is replaced in the reset advertisement by a 2-point, plain rule (reduced in the reproduction here), which is extended around the body matter to the bottom of the cut. This arrangement gives cohesion to the advertisement and separates it from the matter at the side and below. More space is devoted to body matter in the revised advertisement than in the original, yet a 4-point margin appears inside the border.

33. Small Amount of Copy in Large Space.—When a small amount of copy is to be displayed in a comparatively large space, the tendency of some ad-writers is to spread the matter in an effort to make it cover all the space. Invariably, the result is a weak, scattered-looking advertisement. If the first principles of display—contrast and concentration—are kept in mind, it will be an easy matter to produce a strong, effective display plan.

Instead of scattering the type over the space, it should be concentrated in display and body masses. Instead of placing a line of body matter here and a line there, group them all into one or two masses that will contrast strongly with the white background. Concentrate the white into wide margins and have liberal spaces between the displays and body type. A comparison of Figs. 28 and 29 will show clearly the result of displaying advertisements of this kind in the manner just described.

See reset example in Fig. 29

34. Display Advertisements Without Body Matter.
Very often it is necessary to use an advertisement that has little or no body matter. In such a case, the advertisement should be designed so as to give clearness and strength to all the elements contained in the copy. The general rules of display govern this as well as all other classes of advertisements, and care should be exercised to avoid crowding and the use of too large type for the secondary copy.

In Fig. 30 is shown an excellent example of a high-class, half-page, trade-magazine advertisement set in this style.

Resetting of the advertisement shown in Fig. 28. The display and body matter are set in masses, thus affording contrast and avoiding the scattered effect of the original advertisement

This advertisement contains a number of elements—the name of the article, the cut, the prices, the description, the name and address, and the note as to selling agents—yet, with all these elements, it is exceptionally well displayed. Observe how well the illustration balances the price panel, and how clear and strong the main display line stands out.

An example of good arrangement of display elements. Note the perfect harmony of type, the balance and use of cut and price panel

The copy for this advertisement is too brief, though, and not so strong as it should be; it should explain in detail why Rouse job sticks are accurate, convenient, and durable. The sliding end of this composing stick has a brace that makes springing impossible. The illustration shows this feature, and the copy should emphasize it, for it is an important point. If the locking device has any good points, they too should be explained.

MISCELLANEOUS DISPLAY POINTS

35. Harmony of Display Type.—More than two series of display type should not be used in one advertisement. Frequently, the different sizes of one series will suffice. Many type “families” have the condensed and extended faces; others have a regular, bold, Italic bold, condensed bold, etc., and these varied faces of one family always harmonize. Post Italic, for instance, will make a good companion display for the regular Post. John Hancock Condensed and John Hancock Extended may be used very appropriately with the regular John Hancock. Some of the strongest displays are produced by the use of the different faces of one family of type or of just one face in different sizes. When it is necessary to use two series, care should be taken to select types that harmonize; that is, types having the same general characteristics of face. Hearst, for example, could be used well with Pabst, but De Vinne or Gothic would not be harmonious with Post.

36. List of Harmonizing Types.—The following list gives some of the best combinations of the various types shown in Type and Type Measurements, Part 2. These series of type will harmonize with one another, and can be used together in the same advertisement if necessary to depart from the use of one face. For example, in group 3, Bookman Old Style and Cushing Old Style No. 2 may be used together.

1. Post family, Roycroft, Powell, Hearst, and Pabst Old Style.

2. Adver Condensed, Schoeffer, and Adtype.
3. Jensen family, Old-Style Antique, Bookman Old Style, Cushing Old Style No. 2, and Laureate.
4. Arlington Old Style No. 2 and Post Old-Style Italic.
5. Cheltenham family and Bulfinch.

A revision and resetting of the advertisement shown in Fig. 31. Note that all the display lines harmonize and the main features of the advertisement have the proper prominence. This is due to transposing the copy and reducing the unimportant display lines which means that if all the matter is set in large type, no particular part will stand out boldly from the rest. Proper contrast between main portions and those of less importance is the secret of good display of type matter. If it is attempted to make every line a big display line,

An overdisplayed advertisement, due largely to the excessive display of the heading. Space was used for the top display that could have been used to advantage in the body of the advertisement the reader's eye will become confused and the general effect will be displeasing.

38. In Fig. 31 is shown a common example of overdisplay. Fig. 32 shows the result of giving the different portions of the advertisement their proper prominence, reducing the number of faces of type, rearranging the border, and distributing the white space so as to get the best contrast.

Fig. 32 preserves the poster style of display that the advertiser was evidently trying to get in Fig. 31. This advertisement in the original occupied $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches across four columns, which was sufficient space for more and stronger copy than that which appears. There must surely be more selling points about these lots than are given in the copy.

39. In Fig. 33 is shown a department-store advertisement that is another example of overdisplay. Here, the chief fault lies in the overdisplay of a certain portion of the advertisement—the introductory matter. The upper portion of the advertisement would be just as prominent, and perhaps more so, if only one or two lines were set in large display type. At the same time, the effect would be much more pleasing and would permit a better presentation of the body of the advertisement.

40. Overemphasis of Body Matter.—Emphasis of body matter can be effectively secured through the use of capitals, heavy-faced type, Italics, or underscore rules, if not carried to excess. As "much emphasis destroys all emphasis," the fewer the words emphasized, the more they will impress the reader of the advertisement.

Fig. 34 shows an extreme example of overemphasis. No particular portion of the text stands out, and the whole is a jumbled mass that is very difficult to read. Even when the excess of emphasis of body matter is not so marked as in this case, the text will seem "jerky," and look sported, and the tendency of the reader will be to skip from one emphasized word or phrase to the next, instead of reading the text in proper sequence.

41. Special Types and Borders.—Some retail advertisers find it profitable to use the same style of type and border in their advertisements continuously for periods of 6 months or longer. If the advertiser wishes to have the exclusive use of a special border and special type, he must usually purchase them himself. In such a case, the publisher should not use this material for the advertisements of any other patron.

The following estimate will give an idea of what it will cost an advertiser to have his own special type. The type specified in this list is rather light-faced, and is suitable only for an advertiser of high-grade goods. In purchasing his

Takes everything before it like a whirlwind—people will travel miles in order to trade at the store of the merchant with the “STANDARD PHONOGRAPH PLAN.” The women folks, the children and the men folks want this phonograph YOU GIVE A HIGH GRADE PHONOGRAPH TO THEM FREE—and it costs you not a cent. The amount of type and border here specified will be sufficient for the display of an advertisement that is from 4 to 6 inches long and 2 or 3 columns wide.

If the advertiser is a very liberal purchaser of space, he can often induce the newspaper publisher to buy such special type and border.

MEDIUMS

CLASSIFICATION AND GENERAL INFORMATION

INTRODUCTION

1. In advertising, the word medium may be defined as a means of communicating the advertiser's message.

The selection of a proper medium for an advertisement is just as important as the preparation of the copy. A series of advertisements may be very strong so far as text, illustration, and typographical display are concerned, and the appeal to readers may be framed with a thorough understanding of their attitude toward the article, but unless the proper medium is selected, the power of the advertisements will be greatly decreased or possibly lost altogether. The best advertisement of an Oxford Bible would not bring proper returns if inserted in a sporting paper; nor could good results be expected from an automobile advertisement inserted in a newspaper that circulates among the low-waged class.

2. The medium must be taken into consideration even before copy is written, for the character of the copy depends greatly on the medium to be used. An advertisement prepared for the monthly magazines is not always suitable copy for the daily newspapers, and the newspaper advertisement, as a rule, cannot be used effectively as a poster or as a street-car card. Even publications falling in the same general class differ widely in the character of their circulations. Some magazines reach a much larger book-buying element than others; one newspaper reaches a much more prosperous class of readers than another; and so on. What would be good copy for a magazine read mostly by the heads of families would not be the best copy where the purpose is to draw inquiries or orders from boys 12 to 16 years old. Therefore, the subject of mediums is one that should be given early consideration in planning an advertising campaign.

ESSENTIALS OF A GOOD MEDIUM

3. To be profitable to an advertiser, a medium must (1) reach a reasonable number of possible or probable purchasers; (2) appeal to them effectively; and (3) do its work at fair cost.

4. Reaching the Right People.—Obviously, the first requisite of any medium is that it shall bring the advertisement to the attention of people that may reasonably be expected to become purchasers of the article or service advertised, which, of course, necessitates that they shall be able to buy it. Any one longing for a piano would prefer a $600 instrument, but only a few can afford to pay such a price. A good medium for the advertisements of a $600 piano would be one reaching a well-to-do class likely to be interested in pianos. Almost any medium will bring an advertisement to the attention of a few possible purchasers. An ideal medium would be one in which there was no waste; that is, a medium reaching an audience every one of which would be a possible purchaser. There is perhaps no such medium in existence. A medium should increase in value according as the proportion of possible purchasers increases; that is, other things being equal, a publication, 90 per cent. of whose readers are women, should be just twice as valuable to a corset manufacturer as a publication whose proportion of women readers is only 45 per cent.

5. Delivering the Message Effectively.—The medium must be of such character that it will appeal effectively to possible purchasers of the advertiser's goods or service. There are a number of things that contribute to effectiveness. If the medium is a magazine or a newspaper of unusually good standing, with a reputation among its readers for being careful of what is admitted to its pages, the confidence that readers have in such a publication increases its effectiveness. For this reason, a well-established publication that has been subscribed to and read regularly by a large body of readers for many years, is usually valued more highly than a publication just entering the field.

If a publication contains matter of such interest to its readers that it is read with unusual care and is preserved a long time, that attribute increases effectiveness.

If the paper or other material entering into the composition of the medium is of such quality that superior display effects are possible, it also increases the effectiveness. Therefore, other things being equal, a publication that is well printed on good paper should be more effective than one that is poorly printed on poor paper.

An advantageous position of an advertisement in a medium has much to do with effectiveness. It has been proved by actual tests that an advertisement in a well-chosen position will bring several times the returns of the same advertisement in the same medium in an obscure position.

The time at which the medium puts the advertisement before the possible purchaser; the mood in which it catches him; the conditions surrounding him at the time he reads the advertisement—all have an important bearing on effectiveness. The range at which the medium permits the advertisement to be read also has something to do with effectiveness. A publication that may be held in the hand and read allows more detail to be given than does the poster, sign, or car card; and the fact that the medium is of such character as to get into the hands of readers by their choice, that is, not forced on them, is in its favor.

Summing up, effectiveness may be said to depend on the confidence of readers, which in the case of publications is stimulated by wise editorial and business policy, and the length of time the publication has been subscribed to; the interest of the reading pages; the mechanical excellence; the position given the advertisements; and the time and place at which the medium reaches its readers, the mood in which it finds them, and the range at which they read it.

6. Reasonable Cost.—The cost of advertising must be proportionate to the number of possible purchasers reached effectively. A medium may reach a fair number of possible purchasers, and yet the cost may be so great as to make the use of the medium prohibitive. A newspaper or a magazine circulating mostly among country people of a general class would here and there reach a possible purchaser of a $100 typewriter, but the proportion of such readers would be so small that the typewriter manufacturer could not afford to use the medium.

CLASSIFICATION OF MEDIUMS

7. Mediums may be divided into nine general classes as follows: (1) Magazines; (2) newspapers; (3) street cars; (4) posters and signs; (5) catalogs, booklets, folders, letters, etc.; (6) theater programs; (7) moving signs, bulletins, and theater curtains; (8) general programs, almanacs, directories, annuals, prospectuses, books, etc.; (9) novelties.

The first four classes are the most important, and in the advertising world are referred to as "the big four."

CLASSIFICATION OF MAGAZINES AND NEWSPAPERS

8. Magazines.—The term magazine is somewhat indefinite. Its dictionary definition includes all periodical publications containing stories, essays, sketches, and the like, whether illustrated or not. As used in the advertising world, the term is understood to apply particularly to publications issued monthly; but such publications as the Saturday Evening Post, Collier's Weekly, Harper's Weekly, and a number of others, though classed as weeklies, are essentially magazines in character. Publications like Good Housekeeping and the Woman's Home Companion, though classed separately as women's publications, are magazines; so are all "periodical publications containing stories, essays, sketches, and the like."

9. A longer list of separate divisions of magazines could be made, but the following classification is sufficient for all practical purposes: (1) General magazines; (2) women's publications; (3) mail-order publications; (4) trade and professional publications; (5) religious publications; (6) agricultural publications; (7) miscellaneous weeklies; (8) business publications; (9) juvenile publications; (10) recreation and sporting publications; (11) labor journals; and (12) poultry journals.

10. Newspapers.—The classification of newspapers is much more simple. The following classification lists the different classes in the order of their importance to the large advertiser: (1) Dailies; (2) weeklies; (3) semiweeklies; and (4) triweeklies.

STATISTICS AND MISCELLANEOUS DETAILS

11. The Department of Commerce and Labor in a bulletin issued in 1907 reports the aggregate circulation of all newspapers and periodicals issued in the United States to be as follows:

TOTAL CIRCULATION PER ISSUE OF PUBLICATIONS OF VARIOUS CHARACTERS

|--|-------------|
| News, politics, and family reading . . . | 43,285,399 |
| Religious | 22,383,631 |
| Agricultural, horticultural, dairying, stock raising, etc. | 8,106,275 |
| General literature, including monthly and quarterly magazines | 30,615,577 |
| Fraternal organizations | 5,356,427 |
| Society, art, music, fashion, etc. . . . | 15,289,431 |
| Total | 125,036,740 |

CIRCULATIONS ACCORDING TO FREQUENCY OF ISSUE

|--|-------------|
| Daily newspapers, circulation per issue . | 21,042,294 |
| Weeklies, semiweeklies, and triweeklies of all classes, circulation per issue . . | 39,965,695 |
| Monthlies of all classes, circulation per issue | 62,776,115 |
| All other classes, circulation per issue . | 2,878,594 |
| Total | 126,662,698 |

12. As the daily appears every day, its aggregate of copies issued during a month exceeds any of the other classes. It should be noted that the figures for weeklies do not include merely the weekly newspapers, but many other weekly publications of large circulation.

Of the daily, enough copies are issued daily to supply every inhabitant in the United States with one every fourth issue; of the weekly, enough copies are issued to supply every inhabitant with a weekly paper every other issue. The circulation of these two classes is thus sufficient to supply every inhabitant with a daily newspaper one-fourth of the year, and with a weekly one-half of the year. In the case of the monthly, the circulation is sufficient to supply a complete number to each inhabitant for three-fourths of the year.

A leading directory shows in its 1907 edition that there are in the United States 2,358 daily newspapers, 15,454 weekly publications, and 2,712 monthly publications, in addition to 1,211 other publications of smaller classes, such as semiweeklies, triweeklies, quarterlies, etc.

13. Bulletin 79, of the United States Department of Commerce and Labor, shows that in 1905, the latest year of which the statistics treat, the receipts of publishers from advertising were more than $149,517,591, as against $111,298,691 from subscriptions and sales. The advertising receipts for 1905 were 43 per cent. greater than those for 1900, while receipts from subscriptions and sales were 35.9 per cent. greater. In 1880, advertising receipts formed only 44 per cent. of the revenue of publishers, while subscriptions and sales formed 56 per cent. In 1905, advertising receipts formed 56.7 per cent. and subscriptions and sales receipts were only 43.3, the conditions being almost reversed. These figures reflect the growth of advertising and the business prosperity of this country.

14. Figures for the 5 years covered by the bulletin show that of the three principal classes of publications, the largest increase as to the number of new ones was in the monthlies. The next largest increase was in daily newspapers; and there has been a much larger increase in evening newspapers than in morning newspapers, the percentage for morning newspapers being 7 and that for evening papers 11. The increase in the number of weeklies is smaller than that of monthlies and dailies.

The circulation of monthly publications far outstrips the others in percentage of increase and in aggregate circulation per issue. The monthly at present offers the most interesting field for statistical analysis.

15. No better illustration of the increase in circulation can be found than a comparison of the number of inhabitants to each copy per issue in the three main classes of publications. In 1880 there was published a daily newspaper to every 14 persons in the United States. This proportion steadily changed until in 1905 there was 1 daily to every 4 persons. The relation of the weekly to population has been practically stationary. In 1880 there was 1 weekly publication to every 3.1 inhabitants; in 1890, in 1900, and in 1905, 1 to every 2.2 inhabitants. The proportion of monthlies, however, has changed strikingly; it is now almost five times as great as in 1880, having increased from 1 monthly publication to every 6.2 persons in 1880 to 1 for every 1.3 in 1905. From these figures, it is evident that in the proportion of circulation to population the monthly is fast outstripping all other classes.

16. Following are some further interesting extracts from Bulletin 79:

In number and circulation the daily newspapers of most of the smaller cities have held their own against the dailies of the larger cities. Dailies now flourish in communities which not many years since would have been regarded as incapable of supporting publications of this class. Obviously, the prosperity and increasing wealth of such communities are the causes of this change.

By utilizing estimates of population in 1905, it appears that the average circulation per issue of the large city dailies increased at each census year much more rapidly than the average population, thus reflecting not only a generous advance in local patronage, but the extension, already noted, of extra-urban circulation. ♪

In character of product the weekly class occupies a position midway between the daily and the monthly, while the daily must be regarded as distinctively a news medium, and the monthly as distinctively a literary medium; but at the present time both show a tendency to extend their arbitrary boundaries, and the weekly in some respects is suffering from these inroads. * * * Although the aggregate weekly circulation is not growing so fast as that of either the daily or the monthly, it has shown a steady increase at each census from 1850 to 1905. From 1850 to 1860, for example, the aggregate circulation per issue of weekly publications more than doubled, but at no time since that decade has so great a proportion of increase occurred. It is likely that the period of greatest increase in weekly circulation has passed.

Weekly publications may be divided into three general classes. Naturally, the most important of these is the country weekly, the second is the city weekly (devoted to special topics, whether literary, pictorial, or comic), and the third is the trade publication. It is probably a fact that but a small proportion of the residents of rural communities—the agricultural element in particular, dwelling upon the 6,000,000 farms of the United States—are readers of dailies, although the number of such readers is doubtless steadily increasing with the extension of the rural free delivery. They are, however, almost without exception, attentive readers of the local weekly, from which they secure both their news and their politics.

Analysis of the circulation of the weekly by the separation of the states into two general classes—urban and rural—shows that there has been a more marked increase in weekly circulation in urban states. This seems to be due to certain exceptional publications, having a literary or pictorial character, with very large general circulation, for the rural states report a far larger number of weekly publications than the urban states.

MAGAZINES

VALUE OF THE MAGAZINE

17. A large proportion of the money spent in advertising is for magazine space. The magazine is the principal medium for mail-order advertising, and a great many general advertisers spend the bulk of their appropriations for magazine space. This medium, therefore, is one deserving the most careful study. Considering the magazine field first as a whole, there are many arguments in favor of the medium.

18. Large Circulations.—The popular and well-established magazines have very large circulations and are therefore of great value when it is desired to strike a “sledge-hammer blow,” as it were, in making an impression on the public mind. Several millions of readers can be reached by the use of one magazine, and a national campaign that will reach a good proportion of a certain class of readers in all towns and cities can be carried out by using a short list of magazines.

19. Well-Distributed Circulations.—The circulation of a magazine is not confined to any particular locality, but is scattered over a broad field. Magazines are rarely distributed in exact proportion to the population of a state or city. Note the following distribution of a New York magazine of general character, 18 per cent. of the circulation of which goes to rural free delivery:

20. It will be seen that 23,256 of the circulation of the magazine is in the state of New York. The Pennsylvania circulation of 21,531 comes next. As New York has the largest population of any state in the Union, with Pennsylvania a close second, the circulation thus far follows the population. But, although Illinois has a larger population than Ohio, it has only 15,539 of the circulation of this magazine as against 18,858 in Ohio, while California which has only about one-third the population of either of these states has 20,982 of the circulation of this magazine—more than either Ohio or Illinois. A study of the western-state circulation of this magazine shows that it is more popular in the Far West than it is in the East.

This magazine is particularly strong in the Middle West—in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Iowa. Its New York circulation is noticeably weak in proportion to the population of the state. The strength of the magazine in the Middle West may be easily accounted for; it is published there and is evidently better known near home than abroad. Its circulation manager has undoubtedly done his aggressive work in the states surrounding the home office.

22. Advantages of General Distribution of Circulation.—When it is desired to produce a national impression quickly, this general distribution of the magazine argues strongly in favor of the medium. There is not a city or a town of any importance in the United States that would not be reached by advertising placed in several of the magazines having the largest circulation.

Furthermore, the magazine usually has its peculiar clientele and thus enables the advertiser to assemble, as it were, a large body of people of certain tastes and to address them. A newspaper in a city of 100,000 would reach only a limited number of possible purchasers of a $100, glass-lined refrigerator or the most expensive plumbing fixtures. By the use of a high-grade magazine, however, the advertiser could increase the proportion of prospective purchasers and decrease the proportion of non-prospectives.

23. Mechanical Excellence.—The typical magazine has a number of the essentials of effectiveness. It is printed on good paper, and its typographical appearance is made high grade by men expert in that line. If the position given the advertisement is good, the advertiser has an opportunity to make his appeal to the reader with the best illustrative and type effects.

24. Interest of Readers.—The efficiency of magazine space does not, however, depend on mechanical excellence, although when this feature makes the advertising pages as attractive as the reading pages, that increase in value is certainly to be considered. Magazine space is valuable also because readers think enough of the publication to subscribe for it yearly or to pay the newsdealer from 5 to 35 cents a copy for it.

The average person that pays from 25 cents to several dollars a year for a magazine or from 5 to 35 cents a copy expects to read that publication thoroughly. The paying of the price shows that the contents of that magazine appeal to the purchaser, and the interest or confidence of the reader in such contents increases the value of the space.

25. Home Circulation.—The greatest of all reasons for the efficiency of the magazine as a medium is that magazines are to a large extent—some more than others—read in the home. Home reading is, as a rule, done more leisurely, and the mind is in a better condition to receive impressions. At home, writing materials are usually at hand, so that if the reader wishes to write the advertiser, it is convenient to do so.

Home reading also increases the number of readers. It has been demonstrated satisfactorily that publications of the class of The Ladies' Home Journal are read on an average by at least five persons before their usefulness ends. Usually there will be several readers of a magazine of this kind in the immediate family, and then the copy will be lent to a neighbor or sent to a relative that receives little reading matter, and so on.

Some newspapers have a large home circulation, and are read, as a rule, by more than one person; but the newspaper in general never has the home-reading qualities or the number of readers per copy that the magazine has. The life of a newspaper is short; in the case of a daily, its usefulness is ended when it is a day old. On the other hand, the life of a magazine of good quality is, as a rule, at least a month, and the best magazines are kept on file and often treasured for years. A manufacturer of a carpet sweeper that 6 or 8 years ago offered, in a leading woman's magazine, to give a sweeper to every June bride that sent him an invitation to her wedding, continues to receive some invitations every June. This incident demonstrates the long life of the magazine advertisement. Not all magazines, however, have the same life, nor can all truthfully claim five readers to a copy. The character of the magazine determines this.

GENERAL MAGAZINES

26. There are a great many magazines that, while each has its characteristics, are enough alike in general character to be termed general magazines. They are all well known to persons that keep in touch with the publishing world, but a few examples will be given.

Munsey's, McClure's, Everybody's, Success, and the Cosmopolitan are typical examples of the low-priced general magazine with circulations well up into hundreds of thousands.

The Argosy, the Red Book, Lippincott's, Ainslee's, and the Black Cat are typical of a number of publications devoted entirely or largely to fiction and reaching naturally those who care particularly for stories.

The World's Work, the World Today, the Review of Reviews, and the Outlook are typical of magazines that reach people interested in what the world is achieving and in more serious reading.

Harper's Monthly, the Century, and Scribner's represent the higher-priced general magazines—those selling at from 25 to 35 cents a copy.

Magazines of the class of the Atlantic Monthly, while not used so extensively by advertisers as the more popular ones, reach a very intellectual class of readers.

Weeklies like Collier's, the Saturday Evening Post, the Literary Digest, and Leslie's are essentially general magazines in character, but contain a more newsy element. They reach both an intellectual and a progressive class of readers.

While the foregoing and many more somewhat similar magazines have each some claim to distinction, nearly all are adapted to the use of the advertiser of a general product.

POSITION AND RATES FOR GENERAL MAGAZINE ADVERTISING

27. Cover Pages.—The back cover is regarded as the most valuable position in a magazine. An extra price is always asked for this position, and when the advertisement is to be printed in colors the price is greatly increased. In the case of color work, the advertiser, in addition, has to pay the cost of color plates, which will probably amount to $40 or $50. Some magazines also run color pages on the second and third covers.

28. Representative Rate Card of Monthly Magazine.—In Fig. 1 is shown a reproduction of a very simple rate card, giving the rates charged for the various special positions in a magazine. A few magazines will guarantee no special positions. Others, like the magazine whose card is reproduced, will sell at special rates the second and third covers, pages facing these covers, page facing frontispiece, and page facing reading matter of any kind. Special prices are charged for such special positions.

While many advertisers seek these special pages—the back covers of certain magazines often being sold 6 or 8 months in advance—many others feel that the difference in value between a regular black-and-white page and a special position or color page does not warrant the great increase in cost. Usually, the price of a fourth cover in colors or a colored insert (special page inserted among the regular pages) will purchase from two to three inside pages in black and white.

29. Choice Locations for Advertisements.—Publications of the class of Collier's Weekly, the Saturday Evening Post, etc. give a large proportion of their advertisements a position next to reading matter without charging extra; such positions are not always guaranteed, however.

Many advertisers try to secure right-hand pages, believing that these pages are more likely to attract attention than those on the left.

30. Time of Closing Forms.—The larger magazines close their forms at least a month ahead of the date of publication; for example, the forms for the September issue are closed on August 1. A few magazines close from 6 to 7 weeks ahead of the date of issue. Consequently, if some special page is desired, it is always necessary to begin negotiations far in advance of the month of issue.

31. Magazine Space.—In dealing with magazines of the standard size, a page is always understood as meaning a regular $5\frac{1}{2}'' \times 8''$ page, and a line is construed as meaning an agate line 16 picas wide. A half page may be either the 16-pica column the full length of the page, as in Fig. 2 (a), or the page divided by a horizontal line through the center, as in (b). Likewise, a quarter page may be either half of one of the 16-pica columns, as in (c), or a 2-inch space across the full width of the page as in (d).

32. Representative Rate Card of Weekly Magazines.—In Fig. 3 is shown a reproduction of the rate card of one of the weekly magazines having a very large circulation. A study of this card will give an idea of the conditions regarding position, time of sending copy, etc. imposed by publishers of weeklies of large circulation. Note that this publication is much larger than standard magazine size, as are most weekly magazines.

33. General Rate for Magazine Space.—Rates for magazine space vary greatly. Among the standard-size magazines of large circulation, $1 a page per thousand of circulation is considered a fair rate. According to this, a magazine with 300,000 circulation should charge $300 a page. Of course, if a magazine, has a page twice as large as the standard magazine page, the charge would be approximately twice as much. As a rule, the magazines with rather small circulations charge more than $1 a page per thousand, while those with the largest circulations charge a trifle less than $1 a page per thousand.

The magazines selling for a higher subscription price claim that, on account of reaching a more well-to-do class, they are entitled to a higher rate. This argument is sound to a certain extent, but may be easily taken too broadly. There are 5- and 10-cent publications that attract a middle class of readers rather than the well-to-do class; between 100,000 of the circulation of such a magazine and 100,000 of the circulation of a higher-priced and higher-grade magazine there can be no question of the superiority of the latter, provided the commodity to be advertised is an automobile, fine green-house stock, Shetland ponies for the children, etc. But there are some 5-, 10-, and 15-cent publications that reach the best class. Several 15-cent magazines might be mentioned that could not be improved in contents or make-up even if 25 or 35 cents were charged. They are probably making greater profits than some higher-priced publications and can afford to do anything that will make their reading pages more valuable. Therefore, it is a mistake to conclude that a higher-priced magazine is always worth more per line than a high-grade 5-, 10-, or 15-cent publication.

In Table I is shown the circulations and rates of typical general magazines. It will be well to observe this matter closely.

CIRCULATIONS AND RATES OF TYPICAL GENERAL MAGAZINES

| Type of Magazine | Asserted Circulation | Page Rate | Line Rate | Discount |
|--------------------|----------------------|-----------|-----------|---|
| 25-cent, general | 210,000 | $250 | $1.50 | 10 per cent. for 3 pages or 12 insertions |
| 10-cent, fiction . | 460,000 | 300 | 2.00 | No discount |
| 5-cent, fiction . | 135,227 | 120 | .60 | No discount |
| 15-cent, general | 460,702 | 460 | 2.15 | 10 per cent. for 3 pages or 12 insertions |
| 25-cent, general | 166,000 | 250 | 1.50 | 10 per cent. for 3 pages or 12 insertions |
| 25-cent, fiction . | 75,041 | 100 | .50 | 10 per cent. for 3 pages or 12 insertions |
| 10-cent, general | 700,000 | 500 | 3.00 | No discount |

It will be observed from Table I that a number of the magazines have a uniform discount for the use of 3 pages or 12 insertions of an advertisement. The highest-class magazines hold strictly to their rates and no attempt by an advertiser to get a cut rate will avail anything. But not all magazines are so strict. Some may not only cut rates, but sometimes run copy for advertisers on a trade basis (receiving goods in payment) or on a trust basis (the advertiser agreeing to pay according to the orders that the advertising brings).

34. Manner of Sending Out Plates.—Owing to the number of copies to be printed, some of the large magazines run more than one printing press in getting out the same section. They therefore often need several duplicate electrotypes of the advertising pages. In such case, if the advertisement is one that is illustrated with a half-tone, it is better for the advertiser to order the agency to furnish the magazine an original—not an electrotpe—for if an electrotpe is furnished, the publisher will make electrotypes from this, and the effect of an electrotpe made from an electrotpe is usually poor. Cost may be reduced, however, by sending an original half-tone to a magazine that goes to press very early and having the publisher pass it on to another magazine in the same city or some near-by city in time for use. By careful scheduling, one original half-tone may be made to serve three magazines.

One or two magazines like Success have three 16-pica columns and can use for a 2-column advertisement the cut made for a standard magazine page.

35. Copy Schedules.—In many cases, advertisers furnish publishers only one advertisement at a time. In other cases, a series of advertisements covering the entire season will be forwarded with the original order. In such cases, it is advisable to furnish the publisher with a large proof sheet, known as the copy schedule, showing each advertisement, with memoranda directing when each is to be inserted, in what position, etc. In some schedules the advertisements are all of one size; other schedules contain advertisements of various sizes. In newspaper advertising, publishers are sometimes directed to repeat a schedule; that is, after inserting an entire series of advertisements, to start again with No. 1 and run each advertisement a second time. The word rotate is commonly used to indicate that advertisements are to be repeated.

CLASS MAGAZINES

GENERAL REMARKS

36. Value of Class Circulation.—So far as a general explanation of their value is concerned, all such mediums as women's magazines, religious publications, agricultural journals, juvenile publications, etc. may be treated under the head of class publications.

The peculiar value of class publications lies in the fact that they are read largely by a distinct class of people, rather than by the general public. There is little waste circulation. This is a simple fact, but it is one of very great importance in fixing the value of a medium.

If the desire is to place an advertisement of plows, fertilizers, or fruit trees before farmers, it is obvious that a magazine having a circulation of 20,000, nearly all of which is among farmers, is worth a great deal more to an advertiser of such goods than 20,000 of circulation of a general magazine whose circulation among farmers is only 15 per cent. Therefore, the position among mediums of such magazines as the National Farmer and Stock Grower, Up-To-Date Farming, the American Agriculturist, and the Ohio Farmer is an important one.

If it is desired to reach boys exclusively, then it needs no second thought to decide that magazines like the Star Monthly and the American Boy should be selected; and they are consequently worth a higher rate per 1,000 of circulation than any magazine of general circulation would be.

Women's magazines are beyond all question of greater value than general magazines when the article to be advertised is one that appeals only to women. This principle holds true in all cases where it is desired to reach a particular class, whether it be civil engineers, doctors, ministers, business men, grocers, plumbers, or any other particular class.

37. Value to Advertisers of General Articles.—The fact that a class publication is of superior value to an advertiser selling an article that appeals particularly to that class, does not make such a medium of any greater value to other advertisers. An advertiser of business devices and office equipment should find a magazine like System an unusually good producer, because its readers are largely progressive business people; but this magazine does not possess any unusual value to an advertiser of a breakfast food or anything else that appeals to the general public.

The fact is that a great many class publications have rates that are entirely too high for the advertiser of a general product. Publishers of magazines of the religious class are inclined to claim that their mediums are of unusual value to the advertiser of a general product because of the class of subscribers. There is something to this argument, for, of course, the confidence of readers in a publication is a factor that contributes to its value as a medium. However, it is difficult to see why men and women would try a soap, a coffee, or a washing machine any more quickly because it is advertised in their church paper than if they saw it advertised in any high-grade general magazine. The truth is that the best general magazines are more careful of what goes into their advertising columns than are most religious papers. A select few of the religious papers, though, are scrupulously careful, and command the full confidence of their readers.

A foreign-language publication will be read with more interest by the foreign-language-speaking people of America than will publications printed in English, and the advertisements will receive more intelligent attention; but the advertiser must decide whether this circulation is as good as an equal amount of circulation among the English-speaking population. Unless the circulation is as good and as low-priced, there is little argument in favor of the foreign-language publication.

38. Value of Special Copy.—Nowadays, most large advertisers use different copy for many classes of mediums, preparing copy of a decidedly juvenile style where it is to be inserted in a boys' paper, using business arguments and business illustrations where the medium is a business magazine, and so on. This specialization of copy greatly increases the value of class publications.

Some of the most important divisions of class publications will be treated separately in the following pages. As another Section is devoted to technical- and trade-paper advertising, no extended treatment of trade and technical mediums will be given here. The principles already set forth are specific enough to enable the ad-writer to appreciate the value of other class publications that are not treated in detail.

WOMEN'S MAGAZINES

39. Importance of Women as Audience.—No division of magazine mediums is more important than that of women's publications. Most household necessities are purchased by women, and household necessities constitute a large proportion of advertised articles. The tastes and opinions of women influence the purchase of a still greater range of articles. Men are often influenced in the purchase of even their own apparel by the suggestion of mother, wife, sister, or some other female adviser. Some statisticians go so far as to say that 80 per cent. of publicity is directed to women. Magazines and newspapers read largely by women, therefore, demand the most careful attention of the advertiser.

40. Value of Women's Mediums.—A magazine of the class of the Ladies' Home Journal, the Woman's Home Companion, the Delineator, the Ladies' World, Good House-keeping, or the Modern Priscilla is a superior medium when the message is to be addressed to women. These magazines are of a very high type in contents and in mechanical excellence, and are very effective.

41. Cost of Advertising in Women's Magazines.
The cost of advertising in women's magazines may be measured generally by a study of Table II.

CIRCULATIONS AND RATES OF TYPICAL WOMEN'S MAGAZINES

| 208,833 | 9 X 13½ | 16 | $756.00 | $1.00 | 10 per cent. for 3 pages or 12 insertions |
| 438,708 | 9½ X 14½ | 13½ | | 2.00 | 12½ per cent. for 2,000 lines |
| 1,000,000 | 6¾ X 9¾ | 13½ | 1,800.00 | 5.00 | No discount |
| 24,267 | 5½ X 8 | 16 | 60.00 | .40 | 20 per cent. for 12 insertions |
| 163,644 | 9 X 12 | 13½ | 400.00 | .70 | No discount |
| 513,587 | 9¾ X 14½ | 13½ | 1,800.00 | 2.50 | No discount |
| 107,434 | 9½ X 14 | 14 | 117.60 | .25 | 20 per cent. for 12 insertions |
| 1,300,000 | 9¾ X 14½ | 13½ | 5,000.00 | 7.00 | No discount |

The circulations and rates of magazines are constantly changing, and some of them will likely be different from the figures given in Table II at the time this Section is being read, but the proportionate cost does not vary greatly. At first glance, there would seem to be a great proportionate difference in the rates of the two publications charging $1,800 a page, one having a circulation of 1,000,000 and the other only 513,587; the size of the page explains the difference in the page rate, the magazine with the circulation of 1,000,000 having a page only about half the size of the other.

MAIL-ORDER PUBLICATIONS

42. The term mail-order publication is not easy to define, because any publication that is used successfully by mail-order advertisers would come under this classification. Some of the popular 10- and 15-cent magazines are used regularly by mail-order firms, and even the higher-priced magazines are used by those who sell high-grade goods by the mail-order plan. These magazines carry mail-order advertisements of fine sets of books, superior home furnishings, etc. The popular weeklies, such as Collier's, the Saturday Evening Post, etc., carry many mail-order advertisements, as do also the Sunday and weekly newspapers of large circulation, and such special publications as the Associated Sunday Magazine. However, the term mail-order publication usually refers particularly to publications that reach readers in the country and in small towns and villages where the stores are not of the best.

43. Field Covered by Mail-Order Magazines.—A mail-order advertiser of a specialty of some kind may find plenty of interested readers in New York, Chicago, Boston, and other large cities, but the large cities have so many stores that a mail-order advertiser of women's suits, furniture, or any other article of general consumption could not hope to compete with them. Such a mail-order advertiser must look to the people of the smaller towns and the rural districts. This field is a vast one, as more than half the people of the United States live in towns of 4,000 and less and in rural districts. If towns of 8,000 were included in this mail-order territory, the total would be almost two-thirds of the population of the United States. The buying power of this population is enormous, and it is in this field that the great general mail-order houses have built up their patronage.

44. Typical Mail-Order Mediums.—The American Farm World, Cheerful Moments, Woman's World, Home-folks, Comfort, The Gentlewoman, Good Stories, the Metropolitan and Rural Home, Spare Moments, the American Nation, and the Fireside Visitor are a few of a long list of low-priced monthly publications of large circulation that are filled with stories and reading matter of general character and that reach the great rural and semiurban field. Some of these mail-order publications are very cheap in regard to the matter, mechanical appearance, and character of advertising they carry. Others are fairly well printed and contain a grade of matter that brings them a class of subscribers not far below that of some of the 10- and 15-cent magazines.

45. Large Circulations of Mail-Order Magazines. In spite of the unattractiveness of the cheap mail-order monthlies to a reader that subscribes for a number of the best magazines, it cannot be denied that many of these monthlies have enormous circulations—built up by low subscription prices—and that they reach effectively a large class not reached so well by any other medium. Their value is shown beyond doubt by the fact that a number of large advertisers that keep a close record of returns, continue to use this class of publications year after year.

The circulation of the cheap mail-order monthlies consists to some extent of free copies and sample copies, but as these usually go to people that do not receive a great deal of reading matter, and that consequently give attention to all they receive, whether paid for or sent free, this circulation is of some value, though not of the full value of circulation among subscribers.

An advertiser that intends to use mail-order mediums should make it his policy to require proofs of circulation, because there is much room for deception, and undoubtedly many mail-order circulations are greatly exaggerated.

46. Character of Advertising in Mail-Order Magazines.—The manner of appeal of advertisements in mail-order magazines is professedly sensational. Low prices and “something for almost nothing” are the characteristic features of the advertisements presented through these mediums. The offers are very alluring to country people, who constitute the subscribers almost entirely.

But while mail-order magazines, as a class, have the idea “cheap” written all over them, it must not be concluded that the mail-order business is necessarily cheap. The best magazines of this class present much that may be purchased through the mails. Cloaks, jewelry, shoes, household utensils, kitchen, scullery, and laundry requisites, bulbs and seeds, etc. of high grade are successfully advertised in them.

The cheap mail-order magazines are the mainstay of the large general mail-order houses, known as catalog houses, which send out catalogs weighing several pounds and offering the greatest variety of merchandise. Much undesirable medical and speculative advertising rejected by the best general magazines finds its way into the cheap mail-order mediums.

47. Cost of Advertising in Mail-Order Magazines. As a rule, the rate of mail-order publications should not be more than 50 cents a line for each 100,000 circulation. Those with small circulations usually charge a little in excess of this rate, while those with the largest circulations charge a little less. Some advertising agencies set 30 cents a line per 100,000 of circulation as the standard. Table III will give a general idea of the cost of advertising in mail-order publications.

COST OF ADVERTISING IN MAIL-ORDER PUBLICATIONS

| Location of Publication | Asserted Circulation | Line Rate | Space Discount |
|-------------------------|----------------------|-----------|-------------------------|
| New York . . . | 505,804 | $2.00 | No discount |
| New York . . . | 150,000 | .75 | No discount |
| New York . . . | 250,000 | 1.25 | 25 per cent. for 1 page |
| Maine | 102,500 | .50 | No discount |
| Maine | 791,280 | 3.00 | No discount |
| Missouri | 1,591,374 | 6.00 | No discount |
| Massachusetts . . | 76,976 | .50 | No discount |
| Illinois | 431,245 | 1.50 | No discount |

In figuring rates, the quality of the circulation must be given consideration. This quality is by no means exactly the same with every mail-order medium, and the publication with a superior quality would be worth more to some advertisers, if not to all.

The column widths of mail-order publications range from 13 to 14½ picas. The page size ranges from 8 to 9⅞ inches wide to from 12 to 15¼ inches deep.

RELIGIOUS PUBLICATIONS

. 48. Religious publications are always issued as weeklies or monthlies; never as dailies, except when convention numbers are put out.

The religious paper is usually religious in the sense of being the mouthpiece of a church or a creed, and its sphere of influence is among the adherents or the disciples of that church or creed. There has been a decline of late years in the call for the strictly religious paper, because it is usually belated in its news, the "secular" daily papers having forestalled it; is unappreciated in its discussions, because not so many church people or religiously inclined people nowadays care for sectarian argument; and is poorly edited, because the ablest writers are not found in the sectarian class.

Liberality as to points of creed is characteristic of the church-goer of today. However, Roman Catholics never question their church councils. Nothing, therefore, said here as to the decadence of the religious papers applies to Roman Catholic publications, nor in its strongest sense to a few other publications, those of the Seventh-Day Adventists and Christian Scientists, for example.

Each of the Protestant bodies—Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Dutch Reformers, etc.—has a small party within their respective folds that are diligent readers of their church organs, and the Hebrews have a still larger element.

There are a few strictly orthodox organs that, while being very tolerant, appeal to all Protestants. The Christian Herald, the Christian Endeavor World, and the Sunday School Times, all weeklies, are examples. The broadly religious publications, with little sectarian color, are represented in the Outlook, a weekly. Temperance also has its organs and a very loyal following.

The best of the religious publications are good mediums, and undoubtedly command more than ordinary confidence from their readers. The religious publications that circulate mostly within one state or a few states also reach a large agricultural element.

In contracting for space with the religious publications of smaller circulation, it is well to be sure of actual circulation figures and to offer a lower rate than that asked.

A number of Protestant religious publications have merged their advertising interests and offer a combination rate.

49. Cost of Advertising in Religious Publications. The cost of advertising in religious publications may be estimated from the rates of some of the most prominent ones; these rates are given in Table IV. As usual, the rates of publications with small circulations are proportionately higher, and the publishers of these are reticent about circulation figures, preferring to give the number of post offices reached or a liberal estimate of the number of readers, rather than actual figures.

50. Column Widths of Religious Publications. There is so much diversity in column widths among religious papers that new rate cards or an up-to-date directory should be consulted before preparing copy. The range is all the way from 13 to 16 picas.

AGRICULTURAL PUBLICATIONS

51. Agricultural publications are issued both weekly and monthly. The weeklies that circulate among farmers are largely the weekly or semiweekly issues of city dailies; such publications are therefore classed as both agricultural papers and weekly newspapers. The St. Louis Republic (daily) has a weekly edition whose circulation is larger than the daily edition. Other examples of the weekly agricultural newspapers are the Atlanta Constitution, of Atlanta, Georgia, and the Tribune Farmer, of New York City.

These weeklies are, however, only semiagricultural, although they circulate among agriculturists. There are a number of both weekly and monthly publications prepared especially for farmers and carrying advertising particularly adapted to the needs of farmers. A few of these are considered as authorities in regard to agricultural matters and are strong mediums. The second-rate farm publications do not have a strong hold on the interest of their readers and have less strength as mediums.

52. Cost of Advertising in Agricultural Magazines.—Some idea as to the cost of advertising in agricultural papers may be had from Table V.

53. Column Widths of Agricultural Publications. Most agricultural publications use the 13-pica column and have a much larger page than the standard magazine. There are a number with the 13½-pica column, and an occasional publication with a column 14, 15, or 16 picas wide.

NEWSPAPERS

VALUE OF THE NEWSPAPER

54. Considering it from every point of view, the newspaper is more important than any other single class of mediums. It may be used for both local and national campaigns and is adapted to some lines of mail-order advertising. In considering newspapers, the daily paper will be the main subject of consideration. The reasons, in detail, for the value of newspaper space will now be considered.

55. Newspaper as a Carrier of the News.—The newspaper is a part of the daily life of the people. Though a man may not read any magazine, if he can read at all, he is likely to read some newspaper; and the same is true of a woman. The news is almost as much a necessity in this day as are food and clothing. No other class of publications is so indispensable as the newspaper.

56. Local Interests.—Not only does the newspaper carry the news of the world, but it deals with political, social, industrial, and community interests, and this gives it a strong hold on its readers. Even the use of a paper by large department stores increases its value for other advertisers.

57. Concentrating Power of Newspapers.—The newspaper concentrates. A few daily papers have some national circulation and still more circulation within a radius of 500 miles of the office of issue, and some weekly newspapers have a circulation that spreads over a number of states; but excluding these exceptions, it will be found that the circulation of the daily newspaper is confined largely to the city and state of publication.

A statement from the Kansas City Star at the time this Section is being published shows the following distribution of a circulation of 132,822:

|----------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| Home delivery in city . . . | 71,800, or 54 per cent. |
| News-stand sales in city . . . | 682, or $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. |
| Mail subscriptions | 16,559, or $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. |
| Sold by out-of-town agents . . . | 43,782, or 33 per cent. |
| Total circulation in home | |
| city | 72,482, or 55 per cent. |
| Total circulation outside of | |
| home city | 60,340, or 45 per cent. |

A statement at the same time from the Binghamton (New York) Press shows the following distribution of a total circulation of 20,639:

|-------------------------------------|--------|
| Home delivery | 7,616 |
| News-stand sales | 942 |
| Sold by newsboys | 1,492 |
| Mail subscriptions | 3,343 |
| Out-of-town agents | 7,246 |
| Total city circulation | 10,050 |
| Total outside circulation | 10,589 |

A statement from a third paper, the Washington (District of Columbia) Evening Star, shows the following distribution of a circulation of 35,640:

|--|--------|
| Delivered to homes in city | 24,755 |
| City news-stand sales | 3,388 |
| Sold by newsboys | 3,204 |
| Counter sales | 1,439 |
| Out-of-city circulation, by mail | 1,448 |
| Sold by news agents | 1,406 |
| Total city circulation | 32,786 |
| Total out-of-city circulation | 2,854 |

The very closely concentrated circulation of the Washington Evening Star may be partly explained by the fact that it is not published in a state and has no state interests.

There are other cases where the leading paper of a city has been shown by canvass to go into at least 75 per cent. of the occupied homes of the city. It is, therefore, an easy matter to cover any important city thoroughly by using its leading newspapers. Thus, while magazine publicity spreads, newspaper publicity concentrates. Though a magazine appropriation may be liberal, it will fail to make the strong impression in the average city that a liberal use of the city's daily papers would make. The newspaper enables an advertiser with a small appropriation to make a strong appeal to the people of one community.

58. Value of Reaching People Daily.—The newspaper, in addition to its concentrating power, has an additional value in that it reaches the people daily. It enables the advertiser to address his prospective customers weekly, twice a week, three times a week, or daily—just as he chooses. Aggressive newspaper advertising gives the people no chance to forget. If the weather or some event makes it possible for the advertiser to insert a timely advertisement, he can do so and get it before the people in a few hours. The copy may be changed every day. This power of the newspaper to reach so many people daily makes it the mainstay of the average retailer.

59. Confidence of Readers as a Factor.—The confidence that the readers of many newspapers have in the home paper that they read regularly, lends something to the value of the space. This "confidence value" would be greatly increased if the newspapers were as free from political and commercial influences and as vigilant in excluding fraudulent and objectionable advertising as are the best magazines. While the best newspapers now refuse to insert the indecent advertisements that were so common in newspaper columns a few years ago, a great many of the so-called high-grade papers still carry many advertisements that are obviously fraudulent or improper. Such advertisements not only tend to destroy general confidence in the paper but are positively injurious to the advertisers whose announcements are placed near the objectionable matter. An upright advertiser is justified in insisting that his appeal to the public shall not be placed near any medical or investment advertising that is wholly or partly fraudulent.

A recent careful investigation in one of the leading cities of the United States showed that the confidence of representative readers in the integrity of most of the newspapers is not what it should be. The same investigation showed that by far the most attractive features of newspapers are the local-news and the general-news columns.

60. Value of Home Circulation.—"Home circulation" increases the value of the newspaper for most advertising. Home reading not only means, as a rule, more attentive reading, but reading by a larger number of people. Generally speaking, newspapers are not read in the home to the extent that magazines are, but many newspapers are "home papers" to a great extent. The weekly and Sunday newspapers excel the daily editions in this respect; and in the daily field, papers delivered at homes and those sent out on mail subscriptions have greater home-reading qualities than those sold on the street and at news stands, for the simple reason that the paper delivered at the home is less likely to miss getting into the home.

MORNING PAPERS AND EVENING PAPERS

61. Both morning and evening newspapers have good arguments in their favor. The morning papers that go to homes reach there early in the day—before the housekeeper starts out to do the day's buying—and the advertisements are consulted just when they are likely to serve as guides for the day's shopping. The evening papers, on the other hand, reach readers at the time when the day's work is done and when they have the most time and inclination for reading.

There is, of course, a proportion of both morning and evening newspaper circulation that is only "street circulation," being read on the street, in the car, the hotel, the barber shop, etc., and then thrown away; and while this may not detract from the value of the medium so far as the advertising of men's goods is concerned, it does detract from its value as a medium for reaching women.

62. The morning papers are most likely to be read by business men and their wives—people that have a little time to read a newspaper before taking up their duties for the day. Such newspapers usually have quality of circulation, but lack quantity. Their subscription price is, as a rule, higher than that of evening papers, and their street sale is smaller. They are good mediums for advertisers that cater to people of culture and means, and, unless their circulations are very small, they are superior to evening papers for this class of advertising. Evening papers are most likely to be read by working people and by busy housekeepers that have no time to read morning papers. Such papers usually have a greater quantity of circulation but not as high quality. As a rule, the subscription price is lower than that of morning papers and their street sale greater. They are good mediums for advertisers that cater to the masses.

These conditions may be reversed, however, owing to the political or editorial policy of a paper. In some cities the morning paper has the largest circulation, either because a majority of the residents are of the same political faith or because the policy of the paper is more acceptable to the majority than that of the evening paper. There are also cities in which the higher-priced paper is the evening paper. Of late years many high-grade papers that sold for 2 cents or 3 cents a copy have reduced the price to 1 cent. Therefore, the 1-cent paper is not necessarily the paper with the lowest grade of readers; the claim of publishers of 2- and 3-cent papers that their circulation is worth more is occasionally, but not always, sustained by facts.

63. Ordinarily, the retailer is familiar with the local papers and knows which has quality of circulation and which has quantity of circulation. He also knows whether his goods will appeal to the classes or to the masses or to both, and whether he can best afford to spend all his newspaper appropriation in one paper or whether he can use more than one. If more than one is used, he must decide how much to expend in each. This will depend on what number of probable customers each paper can reach for a given amount of money. The patronage of the local advertiser incidentally furnishes the general advertiser a clue to the character of a newspaper's circulation.

No reliable statistics showing the average number of readers to a copy of the average newspaper are available. It is certain, however, that the newspaper does not pass through so many hands as does the magazine. Its life is not so long. Usually, when a daily newspaper is a day old, its usefulness is ended. The weekly newspaper has a longer life, particularly if it goes into the home of a family where no daily papers are received.

WEEKLY NEWSPAPER

64. The decreased subscription price of the daily paper and the improvement in mail facilities—such as rural free delivery—have resulted in an encroachment of the daily on the former exclusive field of the weekly.

The weekly paper still holds sway in the small towns, villages, and rural districts and will always be an advertising factor to be reckoned with, but its scope has diminished in favor of the dailies from the large cities and the new dailies springing up in growing towns. As already mentioned, there are a number of weekly and semiweekly newspapers (usually published by the proprietor of a daily newspaper) that enjoy a wide circulation in their own state and sometimes over a number of other states.

The families that subscribe for weekly newspapers and receive no other, give them more attention than the average daily newspaper receives.

65. "Patent" Insides and Outsides.—Many weekly newspapers have patent insides or patent outsides. These terms refer to pages that are already printed on the paper when the publisher of the weekly newspaper receives it. These "patent" pages usually contain cheap stories, general matter, and general advertisements; they save the publisher something in the cost of composition, but the "patent" newspaper is inferior to the "all-home-print" newspaper. Other publishers of weekly and daily newspapers use plated reading matter (usually called "boiler plate") to save the cost of composition. This, too, is inferior to home-print matter, principally because the matter is not newsy and does not pertain to local affairs.

POSITION AND RATES FOR NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

66. The position required for a large newspaper advertisement is not so important as that for a small one. A half-page advertisement will be seen no matter where it is placed in the newspaper, but a 4-inch single-column advertisement, if not placed judiciously, may be so obscure that it will be seen by only a small proportion of the readers.

67. Choice of Pages.—There are only a few newspapers that sell space on the first page, and these usually sell only 1 or 2 columns. The choice pages are usually the

Of course, if the article to be advertised is in the line of sporting goods, then the sporting page is the best place. Likewise, the literary or book-review page would be the best for the advertisement of a new book, unless the book appealed to a class more likely to give attention to some other page. A successful advertiser of an article purchased exclusively by women always tries to have a 2-inch advertisement of his own inserted on a page with a large dry-goods advertisement, because he knows that women are sure to give attention to pages of this kind. Some newspapers ask a special rate when they are requested merely to put the advertisement on a special page; others do not charge extra for this favor. Advertisers in weekly newspapers nearly always specify "position on home-print page."

68. Full Position.—A position at the top of a column with reading matter along one side, or a position at the bottom of a column following reading matter and with reading matter along one side, is known as full position, or preferred position. When an advertisement is on the most suitable page and has this position, it is placed most advantageously. An advertisement placed alongside of reading and having reading matter under, might have a "good position," but it would not have full position. Sometimes the term special position is used synonymously with full position, or preferred position, but as some newspapers regard other positions as special, it is better for the advertiser to be on the safe side and stipulate just what position his advertisement shall occupy and what page it is to appear on—if he has any preference. The Sterling piano advertisement shown in Fig. 4 is in full position, as is also the reading-notice advertisement shown in the lower right corner of Fig. 5. The Guardian Trust Company advertisement in Fig. 5, with reading on three sides, has more than full position.

69. Charges for Full Position.—A charge varying from 25 to 33½ per cent. more than regular rates is made by

STATE POLICE COMBAT BLACK HAND GANG

Pennsylvania Constabulary Doing Good Work in Breaking Up Lawless Societies.

FOUR TROOPS OF FIFTY MEN.

Unique Organization Has Secured Conviction of Several Leaders in the Coal Regions.

In Pennsylvania a means has been found of curtailing the murderous activities of that organization, which, under the name of Black Hand, has been committing outrages all over the United States.

While the police force of the City of New York is powerless to prevent the almost daily murders and outrages that mark the work of the Black Hand in the metropolis, while postal inspectors are striving to find means by which the Postmaster General's department can prevent Uncle Sam from innocently acting as the agent who carries dread threats, and while special laws are being enacted in some states and legislation may be introduced into Congress at the next session, the Keystone State, through its own normal police machinery is steadily stamping out every vestige of this Italian outlaws.

The work is being done through the State Constabulary, an organization unique in the United States. It consists of four troops, each made up of a captain, lieutenant, five sergeants and fifty men. The force, under the command of Captain John C. Greene, has been most carefully made up of picked men, and there are many noted athletes, rough riders and men who made reputations in the short lived Spanish-American War, included in the number.

This organization is entirely separate from any local police organization, and takes precedence in authority anywhere it goes. The superintendent, Captain Greene, can compel local authorities to give aid to his men, though usually he prefers to work alone.

The original intention in creating the State Constabulary was to have available at all times a well equipped force that could be moved quickly from place to place when turbulence or disorder too great for the strength of the local authorities necessitated outside help. Particularly was it expected that the State Constabulary would have its work cut out in the coal regions, where, thousands of foreigners, unfamiliar with American institutions, and in many cases out of sympathy with them, were too strong to be handled by city and town police or county sheriffs.

It was feared at first that the unlimited powers of the State Constabulary might lead to friction with local police and at first there were some hints of difficulty, but in its two years of existence the new body has done such valuable work that it is welcomed everywhere in times of disorder.

Undoubtedly the best of its achievements has been the recent triumph over the Black Hand. It has been stated that the breeding ground of this dread Italian organization in this country was the so-called coal district of Pennsylvania. Certainly it is that in the district whose biggest cities are Wilkes-Barre and Scranton its first serious outrages are noted.

In Pennsylvania the first display of the power of the Black Hand was disclosed in a curious system by which a whole crop of miners was made to pay tri-

Bitter Truths about Pianos

There was a time when the name piano suggested to everyone not only a high idea of art but a sentimental feeling of art. Unfortunately, commercialism or the love of just making money seems to be changing the very meaning of the word piano. To-day hundreds of so-called pianos are run through factories like lawn mowers or sewing machines. The business of these factories is making pianos for the trade. The name of the real maker is hidden from the public—the general store buys these makers' pianos by the yard, stencils its name upon them, and with flaming advertisements claims authorship to a great artistic instrument. A so-called bargain price sweetens the bait and the unfortunate purchaser soon starves his very soul for the want of the real music which he never gets. Whether or not you buy a

San Diego, Cal., Aug. 17.—Robert J. Burdette, the former humorist of the Eagle, who was years ago designed for the parade on Fifth avenue; his free manners would grace a French salon; his pleasant ways would win a stranger. Everything around him was fresh, new and costly. What a contrast between his present luxurious surroundings and the days when he was writing funny stuff in that earlier day. I mentioned it to him and he smiled.

"Quite different, Dr. Burdette."

"Yes; not quite the same."

"Excuse me for not calling you doctor."

"I'd rather call you Bob to-day. It seems more natural. Have you a hankering to go back to the grid?"

"You know a man who once gets ink on his thumb is never able to get it off," he said, slowly. "I always like to see the newspaper boys, and I often think I'll go back to the turn in the road; but it's fifteen years since I was of the fraternity."

"What 'the fellows' are doing."

"Is newspaper humor growing dull, Dr. Burdette, since your day?"

"Not at all; it's better than ever. Nothing in our day like the oceans of bright stuff found in our big papers."

Mr. Choate, the American delegation to the peace conference, is ready to acknowledge the defeat of his pet scheme for the establishment of a permanent court of arbitration here, but he and James Brown Scott, Secretary of the Department of State at Washington, and a member of the delegation, are doing everything possible to induce the majority of the delegates to adopt Mr. Choate's last proposal, namely the election of fifteen judges of the court by a direct vote of the government in the forthcoming plenary sitting of the committee on arbitration.

Mr. Edward Fry (Great Britain) opposed the American plan, and suggested that the project be submitted to the governments immediately.

Dr. Ray Barbagan (Brazil), M. Morley (France), Baron (Austria) and Baron Baruchall von Hohenstein (Germany) maintain that as it is impossible to agree on the selection of judges, it is useless and unfair to recommend to the governments a scheme which the committee had approved only conditionally and subject to a majority of the members of the committee of judges.

MORNING MOTOR RACES OFF.

It was the intention of the Motor Club of America to run this morning the one hundred mile championship, which ended in a fiasco yesterday. Several of the boats, however, were being repaired, and because of the water conditions were not favorable, it was decided to postpone the event until tomorrow.

This afternoon the programme consisted of races for various classes. The boats have all been repaired and will be able to start in the respective events.

FITS THE "GINGER" IN

The kind of Food Used by Athletes.

A former college athlete, one of the long distance runners, says he has had power of endurance. His experience with a change in food is interesting.

"While I was in training on the local athletic team, my daily 'john' became a high, until after I was put on Grape-Nuts food for two weeks a day. After using the Food for two weeks I felt like a new man. My digestion was perfect, nerves steady and I was full of energy.

"I trained for the mile and the half mile runs (steeple events) which require so much endurance) and then the long daily 'john' which before had been such a task, were clipped off with ease. I was both rested.

"The Grape-Nuts food got me in perfect condition and gave me my 'ginger.' Not only was my physical condition made perfect, and my weight increased, but my mind was made clear and vigorous so that I could get out my studies in about half the time formerly required. Now most all of the University men use Grape-Nuts for they have learned the value, but I think my testimony will not be amiss and may perhaps help some one to learn how the best results can be obtained.

There's a reason for the effect of Grape-Nuts food on the human body and brain. The certain elements in wheat and barley are selected with special reference to their power for rebuilding the brain and nerve centres. The product is then carefully and scientifically prepared so as to make it easy of digestion. The physical and mental results are apparent after two or three weeks and up to produce a profound impression. Read 'The Road to Wellville,' in plain, there's a reason."

publishers for putting advertisements in full position. For putting an advertisement merely next to reading matter, the extra charge is usually 15 to 20 per cent. Not all publishers are able to get advertisers to pay these extra charges, however. Publishers of the larger papers do so, but a great many—most newspaper publishers, in fact—in order to get a large order, have to promise special position without extra charge.

70. Size and Space for Full Position.—Practically all large newspapers have some regulations concerning the size of advertisements that are to go in special position. These regulations are by no means uniform. Some papers will sell special positions to very small advertisements (see the Guardian Trust Company advertisement, Fig. 5), while others require special-position advertisements to be at least 4 inches deep. The reason for the extra charge is due to the superior location and to the fact that a publisher can give such position to only a limited number of advertisements.

71. Run of Paper.—Advertisements that the publishers accept without agreeing to give special position are said to take run of paper (sometimes abbreviated to r. o. p.); that is, to go wherever the publisher or his make-up man finds it most convenient to run them. Most large copy is placed in this way, the size of the advertisements being such that they cannot be made obscure.

72. General Cost of Newspaper Advertising.—In the general advertising field, large advertisers figure on paying in the neighborhood of one-seventh of a cent a line per thousand of circulation for the newspaper space they buy; this would be 1 cent a line for a circulation of 7,000, or 5 cents a line for one of 35,000. The average is a fairly low one and can be arrived at only by using papers of large circulation and by buying enough space to get the minimum rate. Papers with circulations of less than 25,000 usually ask a higher rate than 1 cent a line for each 7,000, and some publishers that claim superior quality of circulation ask at least double this rate. This leads up to the conclusion that papers with large circulation sell their space at a cheaper price than those with small circulations, and this is nearly always true. Inexperienced advertisers frequently err in selecting a paper that offers a low rate when the paper with a rate double that of the cheap paper may have a circulation three or four times as great. Such advertisers injudiciously base their decisions on the appearance of the paper and their advertisement in the columns, forgetting that quantity and quality of circulation are always the important considerations when fixing the value of a newspaper, and that quantity is usually the more important.

The best newspapers maintain their rates, but rate-cutting is one of the evils of the newspaper field. The fact that many publishers will cut their rates in half, forces advertisers to pursue a "dickering" policy; that is, to start with a small offer to the publisher and gradually increase it, creating the impression that a competitive paper will be used if the offer is not accepted.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING TERMS

73. In order to estimate the cost of newspaper advertising more specifically, it is necessary to reproduce some rate cards and to explain the technical terms peculiar to newspaper rates.

74. Flat Rate.—A rate that remains the same regardless of the size of the advertisement or the number of insertions, is called a flat rate. Such a rate is seldom offered by papers of small circulation, for it is to their interest to encourage advertisers to make long-term contracts in order to secure a low rate. It is usually the paper of large circulation that has the flat rate, although only a few newspapers have so far adopted a strictly flat rate. Most large papers have a fixed rate for display advertising up to a certain amount of space, with various discounts when larger quantities of space are used. In Fig. 6 is shown a specimen rate card, adapted from that of a Philadelphia paper of large circulation. This paper, however, does not offer a flat rate but gives discounts on certain quantities of space.

75. Variable Term Rates.—Rates that vary according to the number of insertions of the advertisements, are known as variable term rates. For instance, according to specimen rate card shown in Fig. 7, which is adapted from that of a paper of 20,000 daily circulation, the rate for a 6-inch, single-column advertisement, to be inserted daily for 1 month, would be 50 cents an inch, each insertion. If the advertisement were to run 3 months, the rate would be reduced to $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents an inch, each insertion.

ADVERTISING RATES

Transient Rate, $1 per inch, for each insertion.

Advertisements running 1 week, 75 cents per inch, for each insertion.

Advertisements running 1 month, 50 cents per inch, for each insertion.

Advertisements running 3 months and upwards, $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents per inch, for each insertion.

To secure the minimum rate, at least 5 inches must be inserted every day for 3 months.

Full position, 25 per cent. extra. Alongside reading matter, 10 per cent. extra.

No full position for advertisements less than 3 inches, except by special arrangement.

Telegraph readers, 35 cents per count line. Local readers, 25 cents per count line.

Display contracts not completed will be charged for at short-term rates.

SCHEDULE OF PRICES FOR WANT ADVERTISEMENTS

For Rent, For Sale, Real Estate, Lost, Found, Agents Wanted, Business Opportunities, Money to Lend, $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per word for each insertion.

Situations wanted, three lines free. Excess, $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a word.

Help wanted, $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a word.

All other classifications, 1 cent a word for each insertion.

No advertisements inserted for less than 10 cents.

Terms.—Cash, invariably in advance.

76. Variable Space Rates.—Rates that vary according to the total amount of space used in a stated period (usually 1 year) are called variable space rates. These are also called “Bulk-Space Contract Rates.” Thus, according to specimen rate card shown in Fig. 6, if 2,500 lines were used

SPECIAL POSITIONS

Top of column next to reading, or first following and next reading (42 lines minimum), 33½ per cent. extra. Next to reading, 20 per cent. extra—any specified page 10 per cent. extra. Display advertisements ordered in body type (nonpareil) for full position must have a distinctive heading and be preceded or followed by cut-off rule.

READING NOTICES

Preceded by pure reading, with cut-off rule, set in body type (nonpareil), single insertion 50 cents a line; 500 lines, 40 cents.

Telegraphic readers are charged for at regular reading-notice rate. No advertising is inserted on first or editorial page.

CLASSIFIED "WANTS"

One cent a word each insertion, the count including the words indicating the classification and the address. If ordered set in lines, 8 cents a line. No advertisement taken for less than 10 cents. Agate capitals double price. Display type not allowed.

SPECIAL RATES

Schools, Colleges, Hotel, Resorts, Transportation Lines, Books and Periodicals, and Mail-Order Advertisements, 10 cents a line (flat rate). Amusements, 14 cents a line.

in 1 year, the rate would be the general rate, less $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. As the general rate is 25 cents a line, the advertiser contracting for 2,500 lines would have a net rate of 24.375 cents a line. If 10,000 lines were used within 1 year with this newspaper, the rate would be 25 cents, less 10 per cent., making the net rate $22\frac{1}{2}$ cents a line. In the figuring of rates, it is customary to deduct all discounts (except the cash discount) from the rate per line, thus getting the net line rate as a basis for other calculations. If special position is to be purchased, and the publication charges a fixed percentage for full position, as does the paper whose rates are shown in Fig. 7, the general net rate should first be found, and the percentage for full position added; this should then be multiplied by the number of lines to be used. Suppose, for example, that an advertiser used space continuously for 3 months. Buying space according to card shown in Fig. 7, he would be entitled to a rate of $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents an inch. Adding 25 per cent. to this for full position, the rate would be brought up to $46\frac{7}{8}$ cents an inch. If an advertiser bought 5,000 lines with a paper having rates like those of card shown in Fig. 6, and stipulated that his advertisements must be placed next to reading, his net rate would be 30 cents a line, less 5 per cent., or $28\frac{1}{2}$ cents. In the rate card shown in Fig. 6, the charge for position is merged with the other rate, but most papers have a fixed percentage charge of from 20 per cent. to $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. extra for full position.

If a publisher has one rate for the user of 5,000 lines and a lower rate for the user of 10,000 lines, an advertiser using 7,500 lines would be entitled to only the 5,000-line rate.

77. Suppose it is desired to find the cost, when dealing direct with the publisher, of inserting 15 double-column advertisements 3 inches deep, next to reading, and 10 triple-column advertisements 75 lines deep, run of paper, in the newspaper represented by the card shown in Fig. 8, which is adapted from that of a western newspaper of 75,000 circulation. As each double-column advertisement contains a total of 84 lines, the total amount of space occupied by the small advertisements would be $84 \times 15 = 1,260$ lines. The triple-column advertisements would contain a total of 225 lines each. As there are 10 of these, the total number of lines occupied by the large advertisements would be $225 \times 10 = 2,250$ lines. Therefore, the total amount of space to be occupied by the entire series of copy would be $1,260 + 2,250 = 3,510$ lines. According to the rate card in Fig. 8, the use of 3,510 lines would entitle the advertiser to a rate of 11 cents a line. But as position next to reading is ordered for the small advertisements, the rate on these must be increased 20 per cent., making it $13\frac{1}{2}$ cents. Therefore, the cost would be as follows:

|--|---------------|
| 1,260 lines, at $13\frac{1}{2}$ cents a line | \$166.32 |
| 2,250 lines, at 11 cents a line | 247.50 |
| Total cost | $413.82 |

It will be observed that an advertiser that will use at least an inch every day can get a rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents a line with the newspaper using the card shown in Fig. 8.

DISPLAY

When matter is electrotyped, 15 cents per inch. When composition is required, 5 cents additional. No discount for time or quantity.

Special position, top of column alongside reading matter or first following and alongside reading, add 15 per cent.

READING NOTICES

Among pure reading, 7 cents per counted line.

Among other notices, 5 cents per counted line.

Classified advertisements—Wants, For Sale, Agents, etc.—half cent a word, each insertion, no advertisement taken for less than 10 cents.

GENERAL INFORMATION

Dimensions.—Eight to 16 pages, 7 columns to page, each $20\frac{1}{2}$ inches long and $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches (13 picas) wide.

No advertising accepted for first page.

All bills are payable on 1st of each month.

78. Rate Per Line.—The rate charged for each agate-line space occupied by an advertisement is called the rate per line. Thus, if the rate is 5 cents a line, each insertion, a 4-inch advertisement would cost $$.05 \times 4 \times 14 = \2.80 per insertion, there being 14 lines of old-style agate in an inch. It would make no difference whether the advertisement were set in 10-point or 12-point, or whether half the space were devoted to illustration or to white space, the total amount of space used would be measured and charged for on a basis of 14 agate lines to the inch. In a few papers, the rate is so much per nonpareil line, 12 lines to the inch.

79. Rate Per Inch.—The rate charged for an advertising space 1 inch deep and 1 column wide is known as the rate per inch. The space occupied by an advertisement is never charged on a square-inch basis, but on a column-inch basis. Thus, an 8-inch, double-column advertisement occupies $8 \text{ inches} \times 4\frac{1}{2} \text{ inches} = 35$ square inches, but is charged as $8 \text{ inches} \times 2 \text{ columns} = 16$ column inches. A great many smaller daily papers and most weekly newspapers charge by the inch rather than by the line, as shown in the specimen card, Fig. 9, which is taken from that of a daily having 6,000 circulation.

80. Extra Charge for Cuts or Large Type.—Some papers charge extra for the actual space occupied by the cut portion of an advertisement or for the displayed portion, if the display type is unusually large. This is done to discourage over-illustration or extravagant display. The number of newspapers imposing such restrictions is decreasing, for the simple reason that the restrictions are hindrances to securing orders for space.

81. Breaking Column Rules.—If an advertisement is 2 columns wide, it breaks the rule that runs between the two columns. If it is 3 columns wide, it breaks two such rules, etc.

There are still a few newspapers that make an additional charge for each column rule broken. In such a paper, it would cost less to run 10 inches single column than 5 inches double column. Other papers decide on a minimum space that may be occupied by an advertisement that breaks column rules, as shown in specimen rate card in Fig. 6. The object of these restrictions is to prevent a small advertiser from spreading his advertisement over several columns, which spoils the appearance of the page and also prevents the proper display of other advertisements. If an advertiser in dealing with a large newspaper insists on running double-column advertisements that are only 2 inches deep, and the publisher's rule is that double-column advertisements shall be 3 inches deep, the publisher will run the advertisements with $\frac{1}{2}$ inch of extra space at both top and bottom and charge for 3 inches double-column. It may be said, however, that large advertisers protest vigorously against paying for such extra space, and sometimes the publisher waives his rule. The difficulty may occasionally be adjusted by the resetting of the advertisements by the publisher in the space required by his rules.

Note the following from the card of a league of four newspapers.

| 2 | 28 |
| 3 | 35 |
| 4 | 56 |
| 5 | 84 |
| 6 | 98 |
| 7 | 140 |

82. Change of Copy.—None but papers having small circulation and low space rates make any charge for change of copy. Frequent change is necessary for securing the best results, and progressive publishers make their rates high enough to cover the cost of composition and will permit change of copy whenever desired. Many small dailies, however, and a great many weeklies still have different rates for electrotpe matter and matter that must be set, as will be observed by referring to the specimen card shown in Fig. 9.

The specimen card shown in Fig. 10 gives some further interesting information. This card is adapted from that of a newspaper of 60,000 circulation. Note the minimum size of advertisements for breaking columns. These cards show how necessary it is to study the rates and conditions of large newspapers before attempting to do business with them.

WANT ADVERTISEMENTS

Transient, 1c a word, each insertion, set solid. Displayed, 7c per line. 500 lines in want columns to be used as desired within 1 year, 5c per line. No smaller advertisements than 2 lines accepted. Agate type exclusively in want columns.

RULES FOR BUSINESS

Display matter is reckoned by agate measurement (14 lines to the inch).

In all paid reading notices, the rates are based on counted lines. A single line of reading matter, double price.

When position is to be had at all, extra as follows:

Next to reading matter only, 20 per cent. additional.

First following and next reading, 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. additional. Top of column, next reading, is not guaranteed, but if given, is to be considered a sufficient compliance with requirement of full position.

Full position not sold for advertisements less than 42 lines.

No position sold next to or following any particular kind of reading matter.

Width of column, 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ ems pica. 8 columns to page. 295 agate lines to column.

Outline type and outline cuts on first page, 50 per cent. extra.

No guaranteed position on First, Editorial, Society, or Last Page.

No advertisement accepted for double column less than 35 lines in depth; for triple column less than 75 lines; for 4 columns wide less than 100 lines; for 5 columns wide less than 125 lines; nor for over 5 columns less than 150 lines.

No advertisement accepted for double or triple column on last page unless occupying full columns.

Column rules are not broken on last page. On first page column rules are broken for double-column advertisements, 150 lines in depth, or 3 columns, 200 lines in depth. Advertisements of 4 columns and over, if accepted, must occupy full columns.

The right is reserved to edit or reject copy considered objectionable.

The smaller papers have not nearly so many conditions to meet. The large advertiser can, in fact, get almost anything he wants from the small dailies and the weekly newspapers. The large papers, being more independent, impose many conditions.

83. Foreign Advertisers.—All advertisers that are not strictly local advertisers are called foreign advertisers. The term foreign advertisers does not mean advertisers from foreign countries, although such advertisers would be included. General advertisers is used synonymously with foreign advertisers and is really a more exact expression, but the other term is commonly used. Foreign advertisers usually furnish electrotypes or matrices of advertisements.

84. Double- and Triple-Column Advertisements. An advertisement extending over 2 columns is usually spoken of as a double-column advertisement; one extending over 3 columns, as a triple-column advertisement. The expression "100 lines double column" or "100 lines d. c." means a space 100 lines deep across 2 columns, or a total of 200 lines; "100 lines triple column," means a space 100 lines deep across 3 columns, or a total of 300 lines.

85. Paid Readers.—In the early days of advertising, many advertisements were set in the style of news items with the belief that people had to be tricked into reading advertisements. This theory was long ago exploded, but in spite of the higher rate that newspapers charge for advertisements set in the reading-matter style, many advertisers find them more effective than displayed advertisements. The advertisements shown in Fig. 11 are known as paid readers, or reading notices. They are not imitations of news items except in that the style of setting is similar to that of reading matter. Some of them have the three stars at the end to indicate that they are advertisements, many papers using the stars instead of Adv. It is not judicious to conceal the purpose of this style of advertising. Railroad and steamship companies and promoters of amusements are large users of paid readers. Readers are usually charged for by the "count line," the lines being counted instead of measured by the agate-line system. Some newspapers count the black-faced heading as two lines.

86. Classified Columns.—Classified advertising in newspapers has grown to large proportions, and many papers now carry regularly several pages of these small advertisements. People have learned to look for the real-estate, for-sale, help-wanted, and similar departments, and though these advertisements are usually lacking in display features they are effective and economical. Some newspapers allow classified advertisements to be displayed, but the regular display rate is charged. The classified columns are read by so many people that such advertisers as employment bureaus, companies seeking agents, etc. use classified advertisements in preference to advertisements in the display columns. Many dailies have rates as low as a cent a word for some classified advertisements, with special rates for advertisers of real estate, schools, amusements, steamships, etc. Classified advertising is prized by newspapers because it helps circulation. The competition for classified business is very keen in the larger cities.

Within the last few years, the magazines have adopted this classified feature and are accepting undisplayed advertisements for their classified pages at lower rates than those charged for display.

A great many advertisers that cannot use display advertisements economically find that they can do well with classified advertisements. There seems to be an element of interest or curiosity in human nature that impels people to read classified columns even when there are columns of the matter and little or no display. The greatest value of the classified column, however, lies in the fact that it provides a place where certain advertisements may always be found. The man looking for a position turns eagerly to the help-wanted columns; the stamp collector goes to the section containing the advertisements of stamp and curio dealers; and so on.

87. Sometimes, advertisers other than those advertising for help can insert advertisements in the help-wanted columns and get good results. The International Correspondence Schools, for example, find this department a good one for reaching those who want better positions, and the publisher of a book devoted to methods of securing employment received his best returns from advertisements inserted in the help-wanted columns of large newspapers. Not all newspapers will insert in the help-wanted columns advertisements that are not bona-fide advertisements for help. Some that will insert any advertisement in any classification, regardless of character, charge an extra rate for putting the advertisement of a book in the help-wanted column, for inserting one of real estate for sale in the rent column, and so on.

Classified advertising is of such importance that some advertising agencies make a specialty of quoting advertisers a fixed sum for the insertion of small advertisements in various lists of daily newspapers. This makes it more simple to deal with a number of papers.

In Fig. 12 is shown an exhibit of clippings of classified advertisements taken from several large newspapers.

CONTRACTS

88. As a rule, contracts with publishers do not have so much of a legal appearance as most other contracts have; if they were to appear too legal, publishers would have more difficulty in inducing new advertisers to begin. In the general field, the contract is a simple written order, or agreement, in which the advertiser authorizes the publisher to insert his advertising at a certain rate, or agrees to use a certain amount of the publisher's space within a year at a certain rate. The following order, written as a letter, would be accepted by a publisher without question, provided the correct rates were quoted:

EVENING NEWS COMPANY
Buffalo, N. Y.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1908

Gentlemen:

Enter our order for 5,000 lines of space to be used in your paper within a year at the rate of . . . cents a line when run of paper is given and . . . cents a line when full position is specified. It is understood that if we use 10,000 lines within the year, the run of paper rate shall be . . . cents a line and the full position rate . . . cents a line. You are to send us a copy of each paper containing our advertisements.

Yours very truly

SMITH SOAP COMPANY

89. In the retail field, various simple forms of contracts are used. About the best is a form printed on a card, which may be filed alphabetically, as shown in Fig. 13.

To avoid all possibility of misunderstanding, a contract may state: (1) The amount of space contracted for. (2) If it is a fixed space, the frequency of insertions; namely, daily, every other day, twice a week, or once a week. (3) The amount charged for changing copy, if there be any such charge. (4) Any special style of display type or border that the advertiser proposes to use. (5) The special position of the advertisement, if a special position is desired. (6) The rate. (7) The rebate that may be earned, if any. (8) The frequency of payment—monthly, quarterly, semi-annually, or at the end of the year. Fig. 14 shows an example of a rather formal contract.

90. Some contracts and orders contain a printed clause stating that if the advertiser discontinues before the date of expiration of the contract, or before the total number of inches has been used, he will pay for the amount actually used at the short-term, or smaller-space, rate current at the time the contract was signed. With publishers whose space is sold on an inch basis, the rate per inch varying according to the number of inches used, the advertiser should not contract for more than he is sure of using within the year. Suppose, for instance, that he is contracting with the publisher of a paper having a rate card like that shown in Fig. 6. If he expects to use 3,500 lines in the year, he need only contract for 2,500, as he will have to pay the 2,500-line rate for 3,500 lines. If, however, he expects to use 5,000 lines during the year, the publisher will usually allow him a rebate for each line of space used, equal to the difference between the 2,500-line rate and the 5,000-line rate. But the publisher is not obliged to so rebate unless the contract requires it. Provision for such a rebate should be made in the contract if the advertiser thinks there is any possibility of his earning it. In short, every special agreement should be written in the contract and not left to an oral understanding.

91. Before making a contract with any newspaper or magazine, the rate card of the publication should be studied in order that all discounts or other concessions may be secured. Many magazines will give an extra discount for six or more insertions. With some newspapers, if a small advertisement is run daily (see specimen card, Fig. 8), a lower rate can be had on large advertisements. A small advertisement run daily in order to get a low rate is sometimes called a "rate maker."

It is usually a good plan to contract for all the space that there is any possibility of using and thus secure a low rate. If all the space is not used, the most that the publisher can do is, at the end of the contract period, to require the advertiser to pay the difference between the rate mentioned in the contract and the short-time rate. Often, if the advertiser is one whose patronage is valued, newspaper publishers will not insist on being paid the difference between the two rates; but even if it must be paid, the advertiser will have had the use of the money for perhaps a year. This is better than beginning with an order for a small amount of space at a high rate. However, it is true that many publishers will give rebates if a larger amount of space is used than the contract calls for; that is, if the extra space used is sufficient to entitle the advertiser to a lower rate. The only danger connected with placing the large order and securing the low rate at the outset is that the advertiser may be lavish in the use of space, may still not use all the contract calls for, and in the end be compelled by strict publishers to pay the difference between contract rates and short-time rates.

92. Direct Contracts and Contracts Through Agencies.—In retail advertising, advertisers usually make their contracts direct with publishers, endeavoring, of course, to secure the best rates and positions. In general advertising, however, the space, whether in newspapers, magazines, or street cars, or on bill boards, is usually purchased by an advertising agency. The agency pays for the space, and the advertiser pays the agency. Most publishers allow advertising agencies commissions of from 10 to 15 per cent. on all space bought. The larger part of mail-order advertising is also placed through agencies.

93. Making Offers to Publishers.—Retailers are practically forced to use local newspapers, and unless they are large purchasers of space, they cannot be too independent with local publishers, but the large general advertisers and the agencies usually do a little maneuvering before placing an order. If it is thought that the newspaper will cut its rates and will grant full position free of extra charge, the order is offered at reduced rates and full position is stipulated. If the paper insists on having the full rate and is not influenced by hints that space in a rival paper will be used instead, the order is offered at the minimum run-of-paper rate that the paper offers, but full position is specified and the advertiser does not offer to pay for position. Such efforts to "beat down" the rate and get full position free of charge are not successful with the best newspapers and magazines, but they do succeed with many of the others.

Some rather large newspapers will give full position free of charge rather than lose an order. Sometimes, in the effort to save the appearance of giving special concessions, they will have the order read "run of paper" or "full position requested" and have a private understanding that the advertisements will be favored. Small daily papers and rural weekly newspapers get full rates from local advertisers, but rarely are they able to get them from general advertisers. The general advertiser can see no reason for paying proportionately several times the rates of large publications.

CIRCULATION

94. To determine the actual circulation of the medium he intends to use is one of the most difficult tasks that fall to the lot of the advertising manager.

Circulation is defined by some publishers as "the average number of perfect copies printed for a period of 6 months or a year next preceding the time the statement is made." The period is made to cover a number of preceding months in order that a publisher may not claim that the unusual figures of a recent special edition represent his average circulation. A yearly average, if given truthfully, affords a safe basis. By others, circulation is defined as "the net average of copies distributed to readers after deducting spoiled copies, copies returned by newsdealers, etc."

Those who accept the first definition of circulation believe it to be simplest and best, because it can easily be determined how many copies a publisher prints, and it is not likely that he will print two or three times as many as he can circulate; while, on the other hand, it is not so easy to determine how many copies are free, how many are returned, etc. It is claimed, furthermore, that free copies and exchange copies have some value even if they are not of the full value of those that are purchased.

Undoubtedly the "net-circulation" method is more exact if the figures given are accurate, because file copies, and unsold and spoiled copies are of no value to an advertiser. The advertiser will always be safer in taking an average of several months rather than to depend on the showing of a few issues of either a magazine or a newspaper.

95. Value of Actual Circulation Figures.—Some publishers will not give any circulation figures. The reason in such cases is probably that the publication has not the circulation that the public imagines it to have, and the publisher feels that by giving the real figures he will decrease the value in the eyes of advertisers. A great many publishers, especially those having publications with small circulations, do not hesitate to exaggerate or grossly falsify the figures. Some, instead of telling the number of copies circulated, multiply the figures by five or six and then claim the result as so many "readers." The advertiser in all cases has a right to know the exact number of copies circulated; then he can do his own estimating as to the number of readers to each copy. Advertisers may well be cautious in dealing with publishers that refuse to give figures, that give round numbers instead of exact figures, or that try to substitute the probable number of readers or number of post offices reached for the number of copies circulated.

96. Papers With Small Circulations.—Taken separately, no newspaper printing less than 1,000 copies is worthy of the general advertiser's consideration, although the local advertiser may use it to advantage. The rates of papers printing from 1,000 to 2,000 copies are much higher, proportionately, than the rates of papers having large circulations. As the papers with large circulation reach just as prosperous a class as those with small circulation—often a more prosperous class—there seems to be little reason why the very small papers should be used by the general advertiser, except at very low rates and when it is desired to cover the entire country.

The large general advertisers of the United States deal with newspapers of small circulation by lists, making the same offer to a list of a hundred or more papers, giving orders to those who accept, and paying little attention to those who hold out for their regular rates. Usually, an offer of from \$15 to \$20 will be made for a yearly service that the paper expects about \$50 for rendering. Such advertisers usually supply the papers with electrotypes and pay on completion of service. If insertions are given in wrong position, deductions are made. The country publisher usually has space to spare, and as the advertising requires no composition, it means from \$15 to \$20 that he would not get otherwise; and the offer is in most cases accepted. Large general advertisers usually offer weekly newspapers a rate of from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ cent a line per thousand of circulation.

In the earlier days of advertising there was a great deal of space paid for in type, ink, or other kinds of supplies or merchandise. Some of the agencies had ink and type departments for the trading business. There is still some trading but not nearly so much as formerly.

An advertiser, by applying to those who furnish small papers with patent insides or patent outsides, can buy space cheaper per thousand than he can buy it on the "home-print" pages.

97. Value of Special Issues.—Special issues are good schemes for publishers, because they bring in many advertisers that will not advertise at other times; but it is to be questioned whether a special issue is worth any more to an advertiser than a regular issue. A newspaper, for instance, announces a special educational number, and all schools, colleges, and private teachers are solicited. Perhaps a "write-up" of each advertiser is promised. The claim of the publisher is that everybody within the range of the paper's circulation that is thinking of attending a school of any kind or of studying any subject will look for this educational number and buy it in order to become informed. Perhaps a few persons will do so, but it is a fact that most people never look to any special number of any publication to find out about a school, a summer resort, or a real-estate investment. Such matters are looked up at the time a person is most interested. Another disadvantage is that an advertisement in a special number is always surrounded by a mass of other advertising.

If no higher price is made for the special issue it may be a fair investment; if a higher price is asked, the advertiser is usually better off to save his money and spend it in regular issues of the paper. The circulation and value of special issues are nearly always greatly overrated.

98. Value of New Publications.—The fact that a publication is new is not necessarily detrimental, although the publishers and solicitors of such a publication are usually more enthusiastic about its value than the facts warrant. It takes time and work to build up a large, substantial circulation, and it is frequently the case that much of the circulation of a new newspaper goes to waste and that thousands of copies of a new magazine are returned by the newsdealers as unsold. Nevertheless, the advertising manager must be on the alert so as to see when a new publication is gaining ground and to make the proper reservation of space before rates are increased. By being judicious enough to buy his space on a "rising market," as it were, he can gain many extra thousands of readers. Take, for instance, a publication like the Saturday Evening Post, which, by very aggressive circulation methods, sent its circulation up by bounds. An advertiser that could use a publication of this class profitably would have been far-seeing had he reserved an ample amount of space before the rates were increased.

99. Value of Large Circulations.—It has been demonstrated that, as a rule, the magazine of 400,000 circulation is likely to bring more than four times the returns of one having 100,000 circulation, provided, of course, that they both reach about the same class of readers. This may be accounted for by the fact that there is about the same amount of waste circulation in each case; that is, no more with the magazine having the greater circulation than with the other. Suppose, for instance, that the one with 400,000 circulation has 10,000 waste; this would leave a net circulation of 390,000. If the magazine of 100,000 has 10,000 waste, the net circulation is only 90,000. In such a case, the large magazine, while apparently having only four times the circulation of the other, really has, in the net comparison, four times as much with 30,000 to spare, a difference that should show in the returns.

Furthermore, it should be considered that the older the publication is, the more chance it has had to become popular and to have a larger number of readers per copy. A copy of the Ladies' Home Journal will be seen by a larger number of readers than would a copy of a new woman's magazine, no matter how good it may be, because there are relatives and friends of the subscribers to the Ladies' Home

Journal who ask for it or receive it regularly after the subscriber has finished reading it.

100. Again, the probability that the publisher will exaggerate his circulation is greater when the circulation is small than when it is large.

The publisher of a paper or a magazine of large circulation can produce more cheaply, per thousand copies, than can one of small circulation, and therefore usually has a lower rate, figuring proportionately. Generally speaking, the advertiser does better to use publications of fairly large circulation in spite of the fact that they are crowded with advertisements. Of course, as already suggested, the advertising manager should be alert to see a bargain in a new publication or a good chance in a medium with a small but choice circulation. Publications with small circulation sometimes, on account of the small amount of advertising carried, afford unusual opportunities for good position and good display.

101. Duplication of Circulation.—In selecting mediums for advertising, a question of importance to be answered is whether duplication is advisable for the article or service to be advertised. If it is not advisable, then there should be as little as possible of duplication by the mediums. Mail-order advertisers usually prefer not to duplicate; that is, they would rather use two magazines, each of which reaches a different body of people, than to use two publications that to a large extent go to the same people. Duplication to a reasonable extent is good advertising policy for the retailer and the general advertiser, but if there are four daily newspapers in a city, two morning and two evening, it should not be necessary for the retailer to use all in order to cover the field effectively. If he uses space in the two that come nearest to covering the field, advertising in the other two will be largely duplication and less profitable.

If the article to be advertised is one that will likely be purchased only after people have seen it advertised over and over again—a soap, for instance—more duplication is advisable than in the case of a mail-order article, a bargain sale, etc.

LARGE SPACE VS. SMALL SPACE

102. Another problem that the advertising manager is called on to solve is whether he should use large advertisements or small ones; that is, whether a full page of a magazine will bring more business than two half pages or four quarter pages, and whether it is better to use three or four newspapers of a city and run small or moderate-sized advertisements or to use one or two and have large space.

There can be no general answer to such a question. The experiences of different advertisers do not agree. In some cases, for instance, it has been clearly shown that a full page of a magazine was needed in order to market the article successfully, and in such cases the use of two half pages or of four quarter pages did not bring the business that the full page did. Other instances could be mentioned where quarter pages and half pages of magazines brought, proportionately, more returns than the full page. This is a point that the advertising manager should consider carefully, because if a full page will do more than four times as well as a quarter page, the advertiser will lose money by continuing to use small space; likewise, if a full page brings only twice as many returns as a quarter page, while costing practically four times as much, it is important to return quickly to the policy of using small space.

103. It is true, however, that an aggressive campaign designed to influence the public quickly requires large space. When it is desired to move big lots of goods quickly, it is poor policy to use small advertisements. Sledge-hammer blows are needed. The space must be so big that the public cannot get away from the advertisements. An automobile or a new breakfast food or a new flour could hardly be promoted by the use of eighth-page magazine advertisements. For a campaign of this kind, the big advertisement is best. Where there are several good articles on the market of the same class, big space may be necessary in order to break into the sales and prestige of the older articles. A high-grade new soap, for instance, could not be advertised very successfully with 2-inch advertisements while the magazines are running full-page advertisements of such soaps as Pear's, Ivory, and Packer's. These are occasions when sound judgment and courage to carry out convictions are needed.

On the other hand, there are many articles that can be advertised well in small space, and it should be remembered that small space can be so displayed that it will stand out well even where there are many advertisements, both large and small, in the same publication. An engraving house that wants to advertise an offer to make fifty visiting cards and a plate for $1 would find it more economical to use a 1-inch advertisement than to use larger space; here the need for large space would not exist. But a manufacturer of an automobile could not advertise his product to advantage in the space of a few inches, although it is true that a man having a second-hand machine to sell might find a 1- or a 2-inch advertisement all the space he required.

104. After studying the article and deciding on what space is needed, the advertising manager should watch returns carefully. If he is in doubt as to whether a half-page or a full-page magazine advertisement is better, he should try both with copy of the same character, and decide the question by the returns.

Solicitors will naturally argue for large copy and sometimes the agency, for selfish reasons, will advise it—the more space used, the greater the agent's commission.

105. The question of whether it is best to have large advertisements full of description or advertisements of medium size that contain only a few concise sentences of copy well displayed is very broad, and can be answered intelligently only after a study has been made of the commodity, the plan, and the prospective purchaser in each case. A man would probably not read more than a few sentences about a new laundry soap. The chances are that he would notice little more than the illustration, the name, and the trade phrase, provided the advertisement contained one; and these would probably be forced on him by the display. But that same man might read 2,000 words about an $1,800 automobile if he is thinking of buying a machine of about that price. On the other hand, a woman might read a 500-word advertisement about a complexion lotion or a ready-made suit, while she might not care to read 50 words about automobiles or baseball uniforms. The ad-writer must include in his copy about the amount of matter that he believes the typical prospective customer will read, or the amount that will induce the reader to take the desired action—whether that is to send an order, to resolve to buy the advertised article when again purchasing goods of that nature, or to send for further information. *

MEDIUMS OTHER THAN MAGAZINES AND NEWSPAPERS

STREET CARS

106. As another Section is devoted to street-car advertising, consideration of the street car as a medium is deferred to that Section.

POSTERS AND SIGNS

107. Another Section, Outdoor Advertising, deals fully with posters and signs as mediums.

CATALOGS, BOOKLETS, FOLDERS, LETTERS, ETC.

108. The value of catalogs, booklets, folders, letters, etc. are not treated in this Section, for the reason that three entire Sections are devoted to the subject.

THEATER PROGRAMS

109. Theater programs go regularly into the hands of many thousands of people, and they undoubtedly receive attention. The very presence of a person in a high-priced theater is evidence that he has some money to spend for luxuries and pleasures. There is, however, in all theaters a proportion that get admission as cheaply as they can buy it, and the purchasing power of this element is low. The theaters that appeal to the low-waged class have audiences with still lower purchasing value. People go to theaters to forget ordinary cares and matters and to be entertained. This mental attitude cannot be said to be very favorable to advertising, although the attention given the program before the play or entertainment begins and between the acts, is at a time when the mind is impressionable. How far an interesting play or a cheerful entertainment goes toward effacing the impressions made by the advertisement cannot be gauged. The home-reading quality of the theater program is weak.

110. The articles best adapted to theater-program advertising are those purchased by pleasure-seeking and society people. A restaurant making a specialty of after-theater suppers should be able to get good results from this medium. So should an ice-cream parlor located near the theater. Clothing, hats, jewelry, toilet articles, liquors, liveries, dancing schools, etc., can also be advertised to advantage, provided the rate is low.

111. Cost of Advertising in Theater Programs. There is practically no uniformity in the charges for theater-program space. These programs are controlled by various firms and individuals, who set their prices at about what they think they can get, and often lower it a great deal when a big order is in sight. Some of the programs are approximately magazine size; many are smaller.

A program publisher issuing a program with a page $4\frac{1}{2}$ in. \times $6\frac{1}{2}$ in., claiming an issue of 50,000 a month in two theaters, asks the following rates: For inside pages, \$12 a week on season contracts; \$14 a week on contracts running from 12 to 15 weeks; and \$16 a page for one-time orders. If a patron wishes to use the program of only one theater, the price is cut in half. These prices are asked; the price paid, however, is more often under the price asked than equal to it.

Another theater-program company in one of the largest Eastern cities issues a program covering four prominent theaters, in which it is claimed a total of 35,000 programs a week are circulated. An advertiser may use the program of only one theater if he prefers. The program page measures 8 in. \times 10 in., and the price asked is $10 a week for each theater and $40 a week for all four. A discount of 10 per cent. is offered for a season contract.

The program publishers of the principal New York theaters assert that the average attendance is between 10,000 and 15,000 a week. For each theater, the rate asked for long-time contracts is $1 a week per inch; $3 for 4 inches; $5 a week for a half page; and $10 a week for a whole page. An additional 10 per cent. is asked if advertising is run for only half the season, and 20 per cent. additional if the advertisements appear only 3 months. The size of the program page is 8 in. \times 10 in.

As with other classes of mediums, those having the largest circulation offer proportionately the lowest rate. In the best of these programs, the reading matter is changed frequently; the publishers also encourage the changing of copy on the part of the advertiser.

GENERAL PROGRAMS, ALMANACS, DIRECTORIES, ETC.

112. Advertising managers have much to contend with in the way of solicitors that sell space in church and school programs, almanacs, catalogs, telephone books, directories, etc. In some cities the conditions are such that the local associations of retail merchants have passed resolutions pledging themselves to buy no space in programs, and in such cases a copy of the resolution is usually posted in the store for the benefit of solicitors. Rarely is the value of space in such a medium worth the price asked; sometimes, the advertising value is practically nothing, and the only thing the advertiser receives for his money, provided he yields to the solicitor's persuasion, is the good-will of the solicitor or the one he represents, and this may or may not be of service.

The weaknesses of such schemes are that the price asked for the space is usually out of proportion to the circulation and that the medium is not of such character as to make it particularly valuable for advertising. There are occasional exceptions, of course, but unless the advertiser can be assured of a good circulation for the price he has to pay and be sure that the character of the medium is such that his advertisement is likely to be read—as likely as one in a newspaper or magazine and under as favorable conditions—he should decline the space. An advertisement given to a person soliciting business for the program of a small church fair should be charged to benevolence, not to advertising.

It is very difficult to trace proper returns from directories, programs, etc., and this is a very strong argument against using them.

MOVING SIGNS, BULLETINS, AND THEATER CURTAINS

113. Such mediums as moving signs, bulletins, and theater curtains have been used successfully in the advertising of sports, restaurants, chewing gum, etc. For years, a restaurant on the twenty-third floor of one of the New York office buildings has had a man on the street in that vicinity carrying around a bulletin announcing the claims of the restaurant. In some cities, a baseball game is announced by a large sign driven around in a wagon; a boy in the wagon beats a drum to attract attention. As this sign is seen a few hours before the ball game begins—usually about noon—it is very suggestive.

Theater curtains and other mediums of this kind are at best only supplemental. If the publicity can be had at a reasonable cost, it may prove valuable for some advertisers to support the principal advertising. Such advertising, however, is only of the reminding kind.

ADVERTISING NOVELTIES

114. The advertiser that wants some general publicity can sometimes afford to distribute novelties that will keep his name or his goods before the public. The H. J. Heinz Company gave away green composition pickles for watch charms and lapel buttons; Proctor & Gamble distributed miniature celluloid bars of Ivory soap for watch charms; one of the health-food companies gave souvenir cereal spoons to their patrons; a New York advertising agency gave away very useful reducing glasses—glasses showing how a drawing looks when reduced one-half; and so on. These novelties do not often bring direct sales, but usually merely support other advertising or the sales work.

115. Inasmuch as the more informing class of advertising assures publicity as well as makes direct sales, it would seem that, generally speaking, novelty advertising is a waste of money. This, however, is not true. A savings bank might give away leather wallets on which were printed some suggestions about saving spare dollars. This advertisement would confront the owner of the wallet every time he opened it and might induce him to deposit in the bank. Fig. 15 illustrates an attractive novelty used by a cigar manufacturer. Another novelty (Fig. 16) is an aluminum hat brush that slips beneath the sweat band of the hat. This novelty is very useful and constantly reminds the wearer that his last hat was purchased of the dealer that gave him the brush. Advertising in memorandum books, etc. is not of much value. People are glad to get the books because they are useful, but there is, as a rule, nothing about the use of the book that forces them to think of the advertiser. There are too many memorandum books, diaries, and blotters of the ordinary kind given away for a novelty of this class to have much value. If anything of this class is used it should be of a distinctive kind. For example, if a dealer in steam-engineering supplies wishes to send his customers a book that is partly a brief catalog and partly a diary, it would be better to publish handy tables of special value to people buying or using steam-engine supplies than to publish census figures or any of the other kind of information seen so frequently in books that are given away.

The following is the test of an advertising novelty: Does it constantly remind the user of the advertiser's business? Will it be kept and used by the one to whom it is sent? Does the general publicity thus secured warrant the expense involved? It is rarely that the advertiser can demonstrate by figures whether or not the publicity afforded by a novelty does warwarrant the expense, but must answer the question merely by judgment.

It requires a good deal of calm judgment on the part of an advertising manager to resist the carefully presented arguments of the salesman that may wish to sell some novelty not well adapted to the advertiser's business or may wish to sell even when the advertiser's business is not one well adapted to any kind of novelty advertising.

116. Sometimes, even when the novelty itself has no advertising value, it may help the salesman in securing an interview, or it may create enough good-will to warrant the expense. Some of the large newspapers have given away novelties of considerable value, such as desk diaries, scissors, etc., to the buyers and prospective buyers of their advertising space. The novelties sold no space for the publishers, but those who received them could not help feeling obliged to the senders and could not, with good grace, refuse to see the solicitors of the papers when they came around.

In cases like this, it is wise to restrict the novelties to those whose good-will is worth trying for. When an advertiser gets out an attractive or a useful novelty, everybody wants one, and unless the novelties are given out carefully, many are likely to go where they do the advertiser no good. Many that would probably never do business with an advertising agency asked for one of the reducing glasses previously mentioned, as soon as it was learned that the agency was giving them away; and the supply was soon exhausted.

A certain class of firms, such as jobbers, wholesalers, and others, do very little advertising of the informing kind, but depend largely on keeping their names before their customers and on cultivating good-will. Advertisers of this class can use novelties more profitably than others. Novelties are used extensively as premiums. Such articles as a fountain pen, a leather purse, a handy "tickler" card outfit for the desk, etc. are given as premiums for service of some kind, and, with the advertiser's name on them, contribute something to general publicity.

SELECTION OF MEDIUMS

DETERMINING THE ADVERTISING VALUE

117. Assuming that the advertising manager knows the class he wants to reach with his advertisements, the next important questions are:

1. What medium has in its circulation the largest proportion of prospective customers and the smallest proportion of non-prospectives?
2. How effectively does the medium reach its readers?
3. Is the price asked by the publisher or proprietor of the medium reasonable, considering the number of prospective customers reached effectively?

These are apparently simple questions, but they involve a close study of conditions. A New York City retailer, unless he has a mail-order department, could not use profitably the general magazines of his city, notwithstanding that the magazines reach people of a class similar to those who come to his store. The difficulty is that only a very small proportion of the readers of the magazine can conveniently come to the store. A large proportion of them live in other cities and other states. Therefore, while the magazine would reach the right class and a large number of them, it would not reach them effectively.

118. Publishers' Information.—Some publishers make an effort to aid advertisers in determining whether or not the magazine, newspaper, or trade journal reaches the people at whom the advertiser is aiming. One magazine publisher, for instance, submits to an advertiser a list of the subscribers he has in the advertiser's home city. Knowing many of the people in the list, the advertiser is able to get a good idea of the class of people that read this magazine.

Another magazine publisher has taken the trouble to ascertain the occupation of his readers or a representative part of them. He has statistics that show how many are clergymen, farmers, teachers, housewives, etc.; how many children there are in the homes of readers, and their ages; the sex and age of readers—a matter of very great importance in placing some lines of advertising; the number of children, in the homes of subscribers, that attend a private school or college; likewise the number that have taken a course in some correspondence school; how many readers cultivate flowers or have a garden; what other periodicals are taken in the homes of readers (this is an extremely interesting table of facts full of surprises); and what make of piano, sewing machine, camera, watch, etc. is most popular with his readers.

The publishers of The American Boy have compiled a table showing the range of ages of the subscribers.

Such information as this is a great aid to the advertiser. Its value is well illustrated by an incident in the experience of a watch manufacturer. This manufacturer was urged to use agricultural papers, but he objected on the ground that farmers would not buy watches of good quality. The publisher was able to show by statistics gathered from his subscribers that the great proportion of farmers used Elgin and Waltham watches with good movements, and that few purchased cheap watches.

119. A number of newspapers have shown, in connection with their circulation statements, the average income of the residents of the territory in which the paper circulates, the total wages paid out in the community, etc.

While valuable information can be secured from the better class of solicitors, the advertiser cannot, of course, take every solicitor's statements at face value, for nearly every solicitor will be sure that his medium would pay the advertiser. The solicitor's aim is to get business. He may be so enthusiastic about the value of his medium that he may persuade the advertiser into giving an order to an unsuitable medium and still be sincere. No advertiser can use all mediums profitably at the prices asked for the space. He must learn to sift the statements of publishers and solicitors and to be guided only by what is sound.

Where an advertiser is well acquainted with the publication, as he would be in the case of local newspapers, he can form, from observation, an accurate estimate of the character of the circulation. In such case, if given a truthful statement of the circulation, he should be able to determine the value of the medium.

120. Class of Advertising Carried.—The class of advertising carried by a newspaper or a magazine is not always a trustworthy guide as to the character and value of its circulation, but it throws some light on the subject. It is true that many of the advertisers in any medium under consideration may be using that medium at a loss, but if the publication has carried a number of lines for years and has secured renewals from advertisers that check results, the chances are that the medium is a valuable one for advertisers of similar articles. For instance, a magazine that publishes some reading matter of interest to automobilists and that carries regularly the advertisements of a dozen automobile manufacturers, would seem a better magazine to use than one that carries no advertising of that nature. This, however, is not meant to imply that some of the publications carrying no automobile advertising are not good mediums for the advertiser of automobiles.

The want advertisements that a newspaper carries afford a clue to its value as a medium, and an advertiser rarely makes a mistake in selecting the leading want-advertisement paper of a city.

121. Experiences of Other Advertisers.—When he can be sure that the information given him is accurate, the advertiser may be guided to some extent by the experiences of other advertisers of a similar class. It would be unwise, of course, to follow blindly the lead of others, because much advertising is unprofitable; also, the advertiser that uses mediums merely because a competitor or an advertiser of a somewhat similar article uses them might be throwing his money away; yet if an unusually successful advertiser that is known to have methods of tracing returns uses a medium steadily, it can be safely presumed that the medium pays. Publishers and representatives can often give some useful information regarding the experiences of other advertisers, although their statements are likely to be too favorable to their publications. The most accurate information of this kind will come from the advertising agencies of broad experience.

122. Class of Reading Matter.—As it is the reading matter that builds the circulation of a publication, a study of this ought to help any advertising manager to gauge the character of a medium's circulation, though, of course, it affords no light as to quantity. The advertising manager should not, however, allow his personal opinion to sway his judgment. He may have no liking for a newspaper's policy or for the class of matter published by a magazine, but the question should not be, "Would I read it?" but "Who does read it, and what is the number of such readers?" The last part of this question can usually be determined with reasonable accuracy, particularly in the case of publications. An accurate answer to the first part—that is, who reads the medium?—depends to some extent on the information that the publisher or proprietor gives, and still more on the judgment of the advertising manager. No judicious selection of mediums can be made until a satisfactory answer can be had to this important question, and until it is determined also under what conditions the medium is read. As has already been shown, the fact that some publications are read in the home to a greater extent than others, greatly increases their value for certain kinds of advertising. The results shown by the records are sometimes surprising. A publication that appealed favorably to the advertising manager because of his familiarity with it may prove to be a failure, while another that the manager may have added to the list with much doubt may bring good returns.

DECIDING ON A MEDIUM

123. The student of advertising should remember that an advertiser is not always restricted to one form of advertising. Many of those who have spent their entire appropriations in magazines might have done well had they spent part in newspapers or part in street cars. The same principle will apply to some that have spent their entire appropriations in newspaper, street-car, or bill-board advertising; that is, they might have done well had they invested in other forms of advertising. For instance, the great businesses of the H. J. Heinz Company (pickles, etc.) and the Gerhard Mennen Company (talcum powder) were built up almost entirely by the use of street-car and outdoor advertising; but possibly no competent advertising man would contend that these advertisers would have been unsuccessful had they adopted magazines or newspapers.

It is true that there are some advertisers that cannot get adequate results from anything but magazines, others that find newspapers the most profitable of all mediums, and so on; but there are no such limitations around the advertiser of a breakfast food, a shoe, a soap, or any article that nearly every one consumes. In the case of such an article, good advertising cannot fail to make its impression if placed where the masses can read it.

124. Of course, the question of cost of the advertising enters properly into every purchase of space. The cost must be reasonable for the number of prospective purchasers influenced. If it is not, then the medium is unsuitable, whether it be magazine, newspaper, street car, bill board, or something else. Also, the advertiser of breakfast foods, shoes, soaps, etc. must use good judgment not only in the matter of cost but also in other directions. It would not be the best plan, for instance, for the manufacturer of a shoe, with only $3,000 a year to spend for advertising, to try at the outset, through magazines, to influence the shoe-buying public of the entire United States. His appropriation would not be large enough for a general magazine campaign. The small amount of money would not create a general demand for the shoes strong enough to warrant retailers everywhere buying these shoes in preference to the shoes they were already handling, though it is true that a small but well-managed magazine campaign should prove of much assistance to the salesmen of such a shoe manufacturer, and to that extent it would be successful. Spread over all the United States, however, this appropriation would be so "thin" that it would not make a decided impression on the buying public; no great demand would be created.

Therefore, unless such an advertiser could appropriate more than $3,000 a year for advertising, he would do better to localize his publicity, that is, to use the newspapers or the street cars of one city or a group of cities, where his money would be sufficient to create a real demand. Other cities and other states could be added gradually to the territory. By following this plan, the advertiser could be sure of placing his shoes in local stores and of making sales when his advertisements had interested prospective purchasers. Little, if any, of the force of his advertising would be lost. Magazine publishers would not, however, agree with this conclusion.

125. No tabulation can be made in this Section, showing which articles can be advertised to the best advantage in the magazines, which can be marketed most readily by the use of newspapers, and which can find sale most economically by the use of street cars, bill boards, or other mediums. This is a great problem—one with which the advertising world is constantly wrestling. Sometimes there is no doubt. For instance, for department stores and retail stores generally, there is no medium that approaches the newspaper in value. However, going into the general field, three successful advertisers may be found, one depending chiefly on magazines, another on newspapers, and the third on street cars or outdoor advertising. Another instance could be mentioned in which the advertiser depends more on demonstrations of his product than on any other method. Note the following list:

| ADVERTISER | PRINCIPAL MEDIUM | MAIN SUPPORT | SECOND SUPPORT |
|--------------------------------------|--|---|----------------|
| Department store | Newspapers | { Street cars and signs.. } | |
| Correspondence school | } Magazines | { Distribution of circular matter } | Newspapers |
| General mail-order firm | } Mail-order publi- cations | { Distribution of catalogs. } | |
| Soup manufacturer . . . | Street cars | Magazines | Newspapers |
| Theater | Posters | Newspapers . . | Programs |
| Talking machine | Magazines | Trade papers . | Newspapers |
| Wheat-food concern . . | Demonstrations . . | Magazines | Newspapers |
| Fountain-pen com- pany | } Magazines | Large dailies.. | Trade papers |
| Cigar manufacturer . . | Newspapers | Magazines | Circulars |
| Typical retail store . . | Newspapers | Circulars | |

This list, while interesting, is nothing from which rules or principles may be deduced. Some of the advertisers listed have not always followed these plans, but have, from time to time, changed their policy as to mediums. The department store, for instance, supported its newspaper advertising for 1 year with outdoor signs; then outdoor signs were discontinued and street-car cards were used as a support for the following year.

126. After all has been said, results constitute the only satisfactory test of the value of mediums. When, after due consideration, the advertiser decides to use a medium, he should take steps to trace returns from the medium in order that he may discontinue its use in case it proves unprofitable. While making a trial, however, he should make a fair one; that is, he should expend enough money to test the real value of the space.

METHODS OF COVERING A GIVEN FIELD

127. Covering a State by Use of Newspapers.—The plan of covering a given territory depends entirely on the trade conditions of that territory and the number and character of the mediums. In Indiana, for example, the state capital—Indianapolis—is not only the largest city but the trade and newspaper center; a glance at a map of this state will also show that it is rather unusual as a railroad center: it is also the center of a network of trolley lines. The strategic value of Indianapolis as an advertising center is shown by the fact that it has two dailies at the present time with a combined circulation of more than 150,000. This circulation is unusual for two papers in a city of the size of Indianapolis, and indicates that the papers have a grip on the state. A general advertiser planning to cover Indiana would naturally begin by using the leading Indianapolis papers, and by supplementing a strong campaign from Indianapolis with the use of the leading paper of such cities as South Bend, Muncie, Evansville, Marion, Anderson, Elwood, Hammond, Kokomo, Terre Haute, Richmond, New Albany, Logansport, Michigan City, Lafayette, Fort Wayne, Elkhart, and Jeffersonville, the state could be covered thoroughly.

At the time of the preparing of this Section, the lowest obtainable rate in one of the two largest Indianapolis dailies is $1.05 an inch and that of the other is $1.40 an inch. On a season's contract, three 5-inch, double-column advertisements can be run in these papers at a cost of approximately $150 a week, and two such advertisements can be inserted each week in the leading paper of a selection of eighteen or twenty of the smaller cities of the state for approximately $50 a week, making $200 a week for covering Indiana thoroughly with newspaper publicity.

128. Problems in Large Retail Fields.—Some situations are very complex. Take, for example, the retail field of New York City, which is one of the largest retail buying centers of the world. Many thousands of the residents of such adjacent cities as Newark, Jersey City, Paterson, and Orange, New Jersey, buy in the New York stores. Some of these are reached by the New York papers; to reach others, the local papers of these cities must be used. Brooklyn, a city of a million and a quarter population, with large stores and newspapers of its own, is now a part of Greater New York, and a large proportion of its citizens work in New York and read New York papers. The result is that the New York stores advertise in Brooklyn papers and the Brooklyn stores, in turn, use the New York papers to a smaller extent to reach Brooklyn readers. In New York City itself, there are so many large papers of widely different followings that it is no easy problem for a merchant to decide which can be used to the best advantage.

129. Reaching Women by the Use of Magazines. If the article to be advertised appeals particularly to women, the entire United States could be covered well by a small list of mediums and much other valuable territory besides the United States reached at the same time. The following list shows how the space could be apportioned:

| MAGAZINES | SPACE |
|----------------------------------|--------------------|
| Ladies' Home Journal | $\frac{1}{4}$ page |
| Woman's Home Companion | $\frac{1}{4}$ page |
| Ladies' World | $\frac{1}{4}$ page |
| Modern Priscilla | $\frac{1}{4}$ page |
| Pictorial Review | 1 page |
| Delineator | $\frac{1}{4}$ page |

These publications at the time this Section is being published print between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 copies. The advertiser would be safe in assuming that his mediums would get into the hands of at least 12,000,000 people, possibly more, though this statement should not be construed as meaning that 12,000,000 different people would be reached, because many that read one of these magazines also read one or more of the others. There would be a certain amount of duplication, but for some articles this duplication would not be undesirable. The proportion of these people that will see the advertisement is indeterminable. Of course putting an advertisement before 12,000,000 readers does not mean that the United States is covered, if the word cover be taken in the sense of reaching everybody worth reaching. The foregoing list might be doubled and still leave out a large body of readers that would be prospective customers if reached.

But the advertiser that used this list aggressively would certainly place his advertising before the great body of intelligent woman readers.

It will be observed that quarter pages are listed for some of the publications, while whole pages are indicated for others. This arrangement was made because those in which the quarter pages are to be bought have extra-large pages.

The total rate for this space at the time of preparing this Section is approximately $4,200 monthly, the exact cost depending on the commission charged by the agency and the time that the advertising is to continue.

130. Reaching Different Classes of Men.—Suppose the article to be advertised is one that will appeal particularly to men. If it is of a strictly business character, something like an adding machine, for example, a list should be made up of magazines like System, the Bookkeeper, etc. If it has to do with hunting, publications like Field and Stream should be used to interest the enthusiastic hunter, while more general publications could be used to interest the occasional or "would-be" hunter.

Illustrations of this kind could go on for many pages, for there are hundreds of magazines that attract particular classes of readers and that have special claims for certain kinds of advertising.

VALUE OF SUPPLEMENTAL MEDIUMS

131. In war maneuvers, the successful general often finds it necessary to support his main attack by reinforcements, flanking movements, etc. So, too, the director of an advertising campaign finds it expedient to follow some such plan. A vigorous magazine campaign may be greatly strengthened by newspaper advertising in particular localities. The retailer can often support his newspaper campaign by the use of street-car cards, theater programs, or outdoor advertising; he can always strengthen his attack by the use of good printed matter. These supplemental forms not only reach a good proportion of those who see the principal advertising, thus strengthening the impression on them, but reach many others that are not reached by the principal medium. A department store, for instance, must depend on the newspapers; in fact, nothing else would take the place of this medium. But such a store could, to its advantage, feature its hat department or its popular brands of shoes in the street cars. Likewise, judicious outdoor advertising can be made to strengthen the campaign of a business school in the newspapers or street cars.

132. Again using a military campaign as an illustration of an advertising campaign, it is found that various kinds of weapons are necessary to win a complete victory—big guns that strike hard at long range and kill dozens at one shot; and small arms that are effective only as the battle progresses, but are very effective in spite of the fact that a shot is good for only one victim and that many shots go to waste.

Supplemental mediums serve: (1) to introduce facts into territory that the principal mediums do not reach; (2) to strengthen the impression in territory very thinly covered by the principal mediums; (3) to give further details not supplied by principal mediums; (4) to give local stores general publicity in the country surrounding cities; (5) to give the advertiser the last word with shoppers coming to town or to the stores; and (6) to remind, and to keep up consumption when it is once started.

RETAIL MANAGEMENT

1. The most important requisites of successful retailing are to have the right goods and to so manufacture or buy them that they can be retailed at the right prices. No amount of aggressive advertising can bring continuous success to a retailer that does not carry a good stock of what the people want or what they will want when it is properly advertised. Advertising can only bring buyers to a store. If the merchant's stock and prices are not attractive, the force of the advertising is lost. Local reputation is the retailer's greatest asset; and local reputation will spread only as people are pleased with what they see and buy in the store. The best clerk cannot keep on making fine sales records in a poor store; neither can advertising—salesmanship in print—keep up sales records under such conditions. This would seem to be an obvious fact, but it is altogether too seldom understood. When there is little to tell the people about, little need be expected from the telling of it. If an advertisement exaggerates or deceives and people are disappointed, the store has gained little and lost much.

Some advertisers—those who count only on making one sale to a customer—may deceive and continue to succeed, but the average retailer, in order to do a profitable business, must have a large proportion of his buyers deal with him regularly.

2. What the "right goods" are depends on the store and its location. A shoe store in a town of 25,000 surrounded by a farming community requires a very different stock from a store on Fifth Avenue, New York. This is a problem in the science of merchandizing that does not come properly in this Section, but since every branch of retail advertising depends so largely on right goods and right prices, a consideration of the store's stock is always of importance. The right stock does not necessarily mean a large stock. In fact, some of the most successful smaller stores are able to do a more profitable business by carrying rather small but choice stocks and turning the investments over a number of times during the year than by trying to carry large stocks. For instance, instead of buying a six months' supply of some line, a two months' supply will be bought; when this is sold by means of aggressive advertising, another two months' supply will be bought; and so on. In this way, the merchant with small capital is better able to compete successfully with larger stores. The principle of buying small stocks and keeping the goods moving—allowing nothing to stay in the store over a year—is one on which many successful retail businesses are conducted. Buying relates more closely to the merchandizing part of retailing than to the advertising, but it of course bears a relation to advertising, and it calls for good business judgment.

3. Merchants in the smaller cities frequently declare that the reason they do not carry certain lines of desirable goods is that they never have calls for them. Often, the reason that no calls are made is that customers do not expect that merchant to have the goods. A merchant in a town of 1,000 inhabitants declined to carry men's $1 and $1.25 shirts, saying that the young men of the town always went to the neighboring city of 25,000 to buy their outfits. A competitor, however, put in a stock of such shirts and advertised them, and they sold easily. When the young men knew they could get them at home, they traded at home. There are always certain persons in small towns that want first-class merchandise; and the small-town merchant is only helping the great mail-order houses and the retailers of the larger cities when he permits those that ought to be his customers to go elsewhere for what they want.

STORE SERVICE

4. To have good store service is just as important as to have attractive merchandise. A retailer may make up his products in the most approved manner, or buy most judiciously, and then fail to build up a very successful business solely because of poor store service, which includes lack of system and good management in the store, short-sighted policy toward customers, inadequate delivery service, incompetent help, etc. Volumes could be written on this subject alone, but while it is a subject bearing the closest relation to advertising, it belongs rather in a study of merchandizing. On looking into the methods of such great stores as Wanamaker's, Siegel-Cooper's, Marshall Field's, and others, it can easily be seen how far store policy and store service go to build up a successful business; and wise store policy and perfect store service mean as much to the small retailer as they do to these great stores.

5. Most large stores have their service well systematized, and many of them issue books of rules for employes to study. One book of this kind cautions clerks to refer to the customer's "apartment" rather than to use the word "flat," as some people are a little sensitive about the fact that they live in flats. Clerks are requested to use the word "madam" instead of the word "lady" in addressing women; to say "Will you be seated just a moment" instead of "I'm busy; I'll wait on you when I have finished here." These are merely specimens of the hundreds of practical suggestions made to clerks in order that they may render the most efficient service in dealing with customers. Such stores will not tolerate incompetent, indifferent clerks. If new clerks cannot be trained so that their work and speech are in harmony with the policy of the store, they are released.

It is futile to advertise courteous treatment if a customer is waited on by an indifferent, disrespectful clerk. The prestige of the store suffers when a customer comes in and the clerk says nothing of the advertised offer or is too lazy to show goods properly. The most successful advertising is possible only when the people of the store, from the proprietor down to the elevator boys, support the advertising and study to make shopping a pleasant errand.

It costs something to adopt and live up to the policy of satisfying the customer or returning his money without question, but no store in the long run ever lost anything by such a policy.

WINDOW DISPLAYS

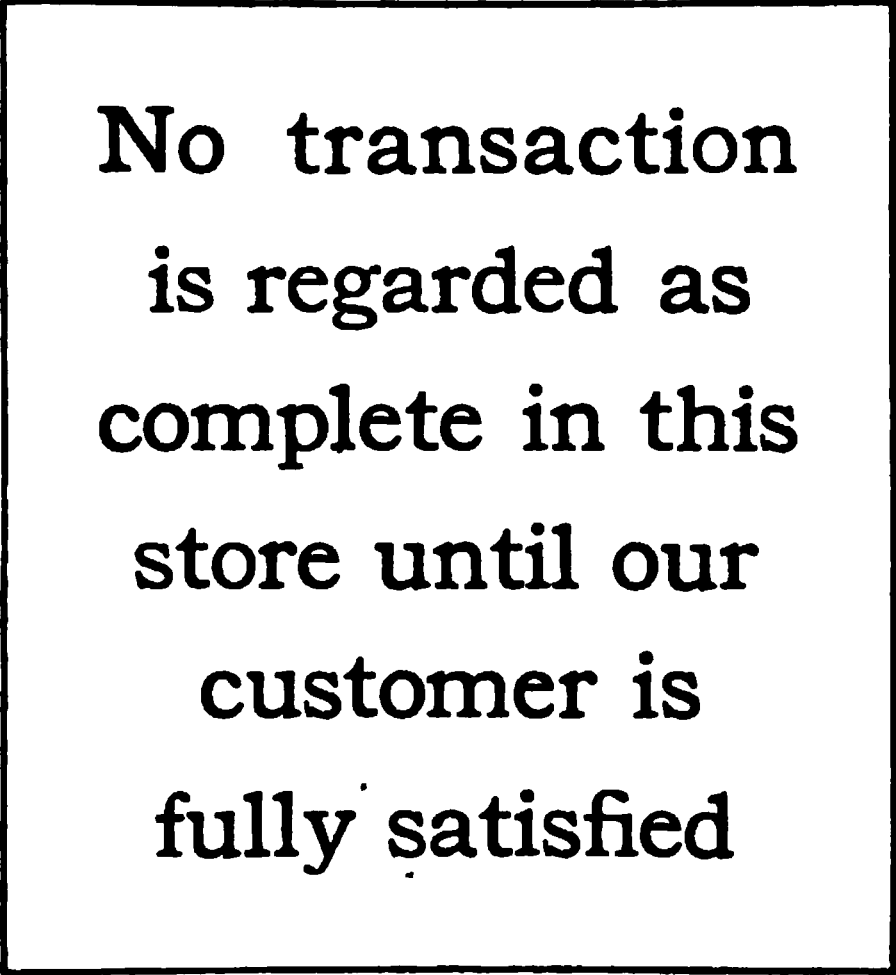

6. Several years ago, one of the retail-trade publications asked a large number of successful retailers this question: "What method of advertising would you retain if you were forced to select one and drop all others?" About 90 per cent. of them answered that they would retain window displaying. The importance of the show window as an advertising factor cannot be overestimated. Not only does it create new business, but it gives the strongest kind of support to whatever advertising the retailer may do. The show window is without doubt the most important part of the store. It is too often the case that a retailer pays a high rent for a store of superior location and show windows, and then does not take full advantage of his opportunity to catch the attention of thousands by means of attractive window displays. The show window can be made a never-ending object of interest to passers-by. When special offerings of any kind are to be made, new goods to be announced, etc., the show windows should contain specimens of such bargains or new goods. Many small-city merchants do not show their goods properly in either the window or the store, nor give details of what they have in their advertisements, and then bewail the fact that their customers go to larger cities to buy or order from the mail-order houses the very goods the retailers have in stock.

7. In small stores, the advertising, the window trimming, and the show-card writing are done by one person—sometimes by the proprietor himself. In such a case, he can take care that one part of this work supports the other. However, when the work is done by different persons, as in large stores, the advertising manager or the ad-writer and the window trimmer and show-card writer must keep in close touch with each other in order that they may work in harmony.

SHOW-CARDS

8. While the show-card is not so important as the proper display of merchandise, it is highly important both in the show window and inside the store. The show-card, whether hand-lettered or printed, is a brief advertisement in nature. It attracts attention, exploits some selling point, or more often tells the price. Inside the store, good show-cards act as guide posts to the merchandise the store is promoting.

Show-card writing is a subject to be studied independently and does not come properly within the scope of an advertising course. Its important relation to advertising, however, merits emphasis. Figs. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 show examples suggestive of copy. Fig. 4 is a particularly good example of a timely card. It appeared in the window of a New York store at the time General Kuroki, of the Japanese army, was visiting the United States and the newspapers had much in their columns about him. The characters on the card are not in Japanese language, but are merely drawn in imitation of Japanese writing. Poor show-cards—those which look as if some small boy had made them—are of little or no value.

BULLETIN BOARDS

9. The bulletin board belongs in the same class as show-cards. Drug stores, grocery stores, meat markets, delicatessen shops, confectionery shops, etc. can use outside bulletins effectively. The bulletin may consist of a frame on which may be fastened tough paper containing well-lettered items or it may consist of a blackboard on which items may be neatly lettered with crayon. In any case, the bulletin board should be so placed on the sidewalk that it will be seen by all persons that go up or down the street. Some Young Men's Christian Associations use bulletin boards to advertise their attractions and have the work done by professional letterers.

Of course, only the bare items can be placed on bulletin boards. But such an item as "Fresh home-made sausage today, 12 cents a pound," may catch the eye.

Baseball scores, weather forecasts, etc. may form a part of the items on the boards, in order to get people to pay more attention, but such news items should be in line with the character of the store. Baseball scores, announcements of fishing and hunting seasons, etc. would be very appropriate for a sporting-goods-store bulletin. In Fig. 6 is shown a good example of a bulletin board for a druggist.

DELIVERY SERVICE

10. While delivery service is another subject that belongs to a study of merchandizing, it is so often a strong selling point that its relation to advertising should be studied by ad-writers. Of course, a store dealing largely in small goods, such as a 5- and 10-cent store, cannot afford to deliver single purchases, and will have to make the minimum purchase that will be delivered 25 or 50 cents. However, many small retailers lose valuable customers because of disinclination or lack of facilities to deliver purchases a mile or more from the store, thus giving the department stores, with their better delivery system, a chance to get the business and to hold it. It would be better to engage for this purpose a boy that can ride a bicycle, or to combine with one or more other small retailers in sharing the expense of a delivery system that will give customers prompt and efficient service. Aggressive retailers in rural communities, where team service is cheap, have cut into the trade of their competitors by delivering such purchases as a barrel of flour anywhere within 3 miles. Sometimes satisfactory arrangements can be made with a local delivery company.

Some city retailers with a view to drawing trade from surrounding country that might otherwise go to rural stores, offer to pay freight charges to any point within 5 miles.

With such retailers as bakers, grocers, butchers, ice-cream dealers, etc., prompt service is of paramount importance, and nothing is more likely to lose business for such a retailer than failure to deliver on time. If a retailer is always prepared to receive orders by telephone and to deliver with reasonable promptness, his store has a strong selling point.

PLANNING AND PREPARING THE ADVERTISING

QUALITY OF RETAIL ADVERTISING

11. Undoubtedly the poorest large class of advertising is that done by the small and medium-sized retail stores. Most large-store advertising is done with some degree of skill, for competent people are engaged in the work. But fully three-fourths of the total of small-store advertising is mediocre or worse. This, however, is not always because the store lacks merchandise and service that could be advertised well. Specialty stores and small stores frequently offer service that is unsurpassed or unequaled by large stores. Poor advertising in such cases is the result of incompetence either on the part of the member of the firm that attends to the advertising or on the part of the person that is engaged to attend to this work. Good retail advertising consists in telling the people, by means of newspapers or other mediums, essentially what a good salesman would tell them in the store; but the person that is to perform this task has to be well advanced in the art of advertising to grasp this idea and to put it into effect.

12. Need of Salesmanship Copy.—In cities of small and medium size, nearly everybody knows where the stores of the principal retailers are located. Therefore, announcements to the effect that the merchant is “still at the old stand with a full stock of goods at low prices” is an almost valueless form of general publicity. The retailer that inserts an advertisement of this kind—and a great deal of retail advertising is of just this character—would not think of making such a pointless, uninteresting statement to a customer in his store; and there is no reason for making a statement like this in his advertisements. The new things that the retailer wants to announce and the old goods that he would like to get off his hands, should be described in his advertisements in a "newsy" style, just as he would tell customers if he called at their homes and tried to get them to come to the store. If the proprietor of the store or his best clerk has time and inclination to attend to the advertising, has a logical, fluent style of writing, describes well, knows human nature, and has good business judgment, he has some advantage over an outside writer in preparing the advertisements, because he is familiar with the goods, the class of trade, and the policy of the store. Furthermore, he has the chance to learn from day to day what attracts the people.

But unless the proprietor or one of his salesmen has the necessary ability to advertise the store properly, the best outside man obtainable should be engaged. In nearly all cities will be found capable writers whose service may be had at from $8 to $40 a month, according to the amount and character of the work. It does not pay to employ a poor ad-writer. The best advertising is none too good, and the difference between fair work and good work means more than a difference of a few dollars a week in the compensation given the ad-writer.

13. If an outside writer is employed, he should be paid for enough of his time to permit him to study thoroughly the policy and service of the store and the goods. No amount of writing ability can take the place of a thorough knowledge of the store and what it has to offer; if the writer tries to get along without this, the copy he produces will likely be superficial. He should have talks with the proprietor and talks with the salesmen; he should have the privilege of examining the goods and of asking all the questions that occur to him. Talks with the proprietor will enable him to perfect plans; talks with the salesmen and examination of the goods will enable him to get out realistic, interesting copy that will make sales. This principle cannot be emphasized too often or too strongly; that is, in order to advertise a business successfully the ad-writer must study it and learn all the salient facts—the things that will interest people in it. For example, as suggested in Copy for Advertisements, Part 2, if an ad-writer is to help a manufacturer and retailer of ice cream to dispose of the product, he should not merely assume that it is fine ice cream, and go ahead with the advertising. To be sure, the mere name of the cream and of the maker and a little catch phrase, if published often enough in good mediums, will in time, make a public impression and bring some business; but the advertiser should not be content to get a little publicity for his money when the publication of a series of interesting facts, one or two at a time, will bring more business. The writer should go beyond even the process of making. He should ascertain whether or not superior cream is used and from what grade of milk it is taken. He should look into the seasoning used to see if there are strong selling points on that subject. The cleanliness with which the ice cream is made, the carefulness employed in following the formula, the facilities of the store in providing a variety of flavors in creams and ices, the features of the delivery system, a study of the different classes of people that buy ice cream, a study of the competition—all these and other things should be investigated thoroughly. If such an investigation as this is made, facts will be discovered in almost every retail business that will assist in promoting the goods offered for sale.

The same principle applies to advertisers that sell service rather than goods. Suppose, for example, that a business school is to be advertised. The general claim that “it is the biggest and the best” makes little impression on the public. The ad-writer should gather facts that show why young men and women do well to study bookkeeping and shorthand, that show how employers apply to the school for its graduates, that bring out the ability and experience of the teachers of the school, etc.

If a plumbing and heating shop is to be advertised, the telling of an instance when a break in a pipe was repaired in 38 minutes from the time the telephone call came to the shop is worth a great deal more than the stereotyped claim of prompt service; and such items as these can be gathered only by close investigation.

14. In some cities there are advertising agencies with staffs of very competent writers that make a specialty of writing retail advertisements. These agencies enable the retailer to have the services of a high-grade man without being obliged to pay for all of his time.

15. Syndicate advertising service has also entered to some extent into the retail field. By syndicate advertising service is meant the service offered by firms that write up and illustrate special lines of advertisements and offer to sell this copy to one retailer in each city. Shoe advertisements, bank advertisements, and other special advertisements of this nature are favorites with syndicate ad-writers. While some of this copy is better than the work of the average ad-writer and is cheaper, it lacks individuality. If within the retailer's means, it is much better for him to have copy written particularly for his store and his special line of goods.

THE YEAR'S WORK

16. What the Plan Should Cover.—The advertising of any retail business should be conducted along the lines of a general plan, or scheme, determined in advance. At the beginning of each new year, the firm and the advertising manager should, if possible, decide: (1) how much money is to be spent during the year for advertising of all kinds; (2) in what mediums it is to be spent; and (3) the amount to be spent in each of the 12 months.

17. Annual Expenditure for Advertising.—Before a new advertiser decides how much he will spend for advertising, he should first arrive at a clear understanding of the relation of advertising to his business. Some business men look on advertising as an unproductive expense item only—a necessary evil, as it were—like bookkeeping or stationery; and, without doubt, the kind of advertising that lacks every element of salesmanship—that runs without change of copy week after week—is an unproductive item of expense. Other business men regard advertising as an investment, which, if properly cared for, will yield a good profit. This is the modern view of advertising. Advertising pays if it is made to pay. It is very easy to lose money in advertising that is badly planned and poorly conducted, while, on the contrary, it is almost as easy to make money in advertising that is well planned and skilfully conducted.

18. Margin for Emergencies.—It is seldom the case that any advertising plan—no matter how skilfully conceived—can be rigidly adhered to. Conditions may arise that will necessitate a heavier expenditure in some months than was originally provided for; or, perhaps, in some other month, less advertising is done than was anticipated. These ups and downs offset each other as a rule, but every appropriation for advertising should be large enough to meet emergencies or cover unlooked-for expenditures that are almost certain to become necessary or advisable. For instance, if a merchant is unwilling to spend more than $6,000 for the year's advertising, the plan should dispose of not more than $5,500, leaving a margin of $500 to meet unusual expenses or to take advantage of unexpected opportunities.

19. Amount That Can be Profitably Spent.—In deciding on how much to spend for advertising, the retailer must consider: (1) the average gross percentage of profit on his sales, and (2) the net annual percentage of profit on his capital. It is apparent that if the gross profit on an article is $1, the amount that can be profitably spent to sell it through advertising must be much less than $1. A portion of the dollar profit must go to pay its share of the store rent, the salesmen's salaries, and the other expenses of the business. Then, in order that there shall be some net profit left, only a portion of the remaining gross profit may be spent in advertising.

20. A successful Brooklyn store furnishes an illustration of how skilfully cost of selling may be figured. According to its figures, the average cost of selling is 23 per cent. of the sales. Ten per cent. of this figure covers general store expense, rent, light, depreciation of stock, etc.; the remaining 13 per cent. covers the cost of labor and advertising. If labor can be kept down to 6 per cent., then the store has 7 per cent. for advertising. Of course, both the sum represented by this 23 per cent. and the profit percentage of this store are added to the cost prices of goods. The full amount is not added to the prices of those articles that must be sold close to cost, but on other articles a higher profit percentage is added, so that the average sales will bring in the full expense and profit percentages.

To illustrate how advertising, in spite of the expenditure, makes a business profitable, suppose that a retailer is selling clothing, without advertising, at an average gross profit of 40 per cent. If he sells $10,000 worth of clothing at 40 per cent. profit, he will take in $14,000 and his gross cash profit will be $4,000. Out of this amount he must deduct perhaps $1,000 for rent, insurance, etc., and $2,000 for salesmen's salaries and all other expenses. This leaves $1,000 net profit; just 10 per cent. of the $10,000 originally invested. Therefore, the net annual percentage of profit on his capital is 10 per cent. If he now decides to begin advertising, he may, perhaps, appropriate 4 per cent. of his gross sales.

21. Turning Over Capital.—Now this question arises: If this retailer can regularly make 10 per cent. net profit without advertising, why should he spend $560 of this $1,000 profit and thus cut down his percentage of profit from 10 per cent. to 4.4 per cent. The answer is: Advertising should largely increase the number of sales, and several sales during a year at a net profit of 4.4 per cent. on each sale is better than one sale during the year at a net profit of 10 per cent. As business men express it "Advertising causes a more rapid turnover of capital." In this way, larger earnings on small capital are made possible.

To illustrate this point, suppose that a clothing dealer's entire capital is $40,000, and that without any advertising he is able, during the year, to sell $40,000 worth of clothing at a net profit of 10 per cent. Then he will have used or "turned over" his capital just once during the year, and the net annual profit of the business will be $4,000, or 10 per cent. on his investment of $40,000. In another year, he decides to spend in advertising 4 per cent. of the gross sales of the previous year (value of stock, $40,000 + $4,000 profit = $44,000 in gross sales), or $1,760. Though this additional selling expense reduces the profit on individual sales, it enables him to make very many more sales during the year and to end the year with total sales of $70,000; still the capital required for this business was the same $40,000 of the previous year. Thus he has been able to turn the $40,000 over once during the year and lacked only $10,000 in sales of turning it over twice. Even if the advertising and other additional selling expense has reduced the net profit on each sale to 7.526 per cent., the total net profit for the year is $4,900, which is $900 greater than the previous year and amounts to 12.25 per cent. profit on the investment, a gain of 2.25 per cent. over the previous year. Then, too, the inside running expenses of a business, rent, salaries, etc., should not increase in exact proportion to the increased sales. This is another of the many benefits of advertising.

It should not be inferred from the foregoing that 4 per cent. of the gross sales is the proper percentage for all clothing stores. This percentage is merely used as an illustration. The proper percentage depends on the amount of the trade, the size of the territory, and other conditions. It might be 4 per cent. or it might be 6 or 8 per cent.; the exact amount is a question for the advertiser and his advertising man to decide.

The smaller the capital of a business, the more necessary is a frequent turnover of that capital. If a grocer has only $2,000 capital, and expects to make a $1,000 living out of his grocery business, he will certainly have to turn over his capital many times during the year. This is one good reason that the retailer with a small capital should advertise.

22. Advertising a New Firm.—Firms already established in business know from experience what their net profit has been and can allow a definite percentage of total sales for advertising. But firms just starting in business must take as a basis of calculation an estimate of sales. Whether such an estimate be correct or not will depend on their business judgment and experience. However, no new store can get a start nowadays in a town or city without a fair advertising outlay, and the expenditure must necessarily be larger than that required to produce the same results for an established business. The public needs to be told of the new firm's existence, and why it should transfer all or part of its patronage from the older firms to the new. Many a new retail business is operated for the first year at a loss, due to the heavy advertising required at the start. But after the "ball is started rolling" the problem of securing business through advertising becomes much simpler.

23. Spending Cash Discounts for Advertising.—To encourage the prompt payment of bills, and to avoid the acquirement of bad accounts, wholesalers usually allow retailers a discount of from 2 to 10 per cent. on merchandise bills that are paid within 10 days of date of invoice. Some retailers make it a rule to spend the amount of their cash discounts for advertising. But this is a rather uncertain plan, if followed literally. Such advertisers must figure that their yearly average of discounts about equals the amount they are willing to spend for advertising, so it would seem better to determine their expenditure definitely on a percentage-of-sales basis.

24. Determining the Total Expenditure for the Year.—Having decided what percentage of sales is to be spent in advertising, the retailer may determine in advance his total expenditure for the year, either by taking as a basis of calculation the sales of the year just ended, or the total he expects to get during the year just beginning. Where the advertiser is satisfied with a slow but steady business growth, the former basis of calculation is the safest; where, on the other hand, he desires to increase his annual sales rapidly, he must use the latter basis of calculation.

Inasmuch as the retailer is buying goods throughout all the year, it would seem practicable for him to spend for advertising a certain percentage of the total sales of each lot of goods from time to time. But this plan is open to serious objections: First, he would be unable to decide in advance his probable expenditure for the year. He could therefore make no definite plans as to the distribution of his expenditure, and not being able to estimate how much advertising he would do, he could not get the most advantageous rates from any newspapers but those selling space on the flat-rate basis. Second, it must be remembered that the percentage of sales with which he is figuring is an average percentage, determined after careful consideration of his annual business. It would not be practicable, for instance, for a dry-goods house to spend the same percentage in advertising a staple like cotton as in advertising more profitable articles like silk skirts. The merchant might perhaps spend $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the cotton and 4 per cent. on the silk skirts, and so on with other articles, as long as his total for the year averaged up correctly. In the case of the larger retail stores, the advertising is not always conducted solely to force the sale of the articles advertised. Certain articles may be offered as leaders to draw the crowd. For instance, in "Annual White-Goods Sales," cotton sheeting is sometimes offered below cost, simply to create talk and to draw customers to the store, where more profitable goods may also be sold to them. In such a case, the advertising of the cotton may cost as much as, or more than, the amount received for it.

All these arguments apply with equal force to the scheme of spending cash discounts on each line for advertising to sell it.

Advertising is resorted to in order to promote trade in general, rather than to dispose of each different line of goods separately. It is something like a man drawing a salary of $20 a day. On many days he will not earn $5, but on other days he may earn $200. In the whole year his worth to his employer may average more than $20 a day. Just so with advertising. It is impossible to count the returns on any one dollar spent for advertising, but $100 or $5,000 judiciously spent will surely produce satisfactory results.

APPROPRIATIONS

25. Time Distribution of Appropriations.—After the total annual expenditure has been determined, the amount to be paid out for the salary of the advertising manager, or ad-writer, and the margin reserved for emergencies should be deducted from the estimated total expenditure. The remainder will represent the amount that is to be spent for space in various mediums and for printing and other advertising expenses.

The next thing to be determined is how much is to be spent in each of the 12 months of the year. This brings up the question of when it pays best to advertise: when business is naturally dull or when it is naturally brisk.

On the one hand, advertising might be considered as a stimulant for brisk trade at a time when everybody is inclined to buy; just before Christmas, for instance, it would seem best to use large space in an effort to capture a fair share of the holiday business. On the other hand, a plausible argument would be that since everybody intends to buy Christmas presents whether the dealer advertises or not, he might as well save his money and buy advertising in dull times, when business needs a tonic.

26. There are good points in both arguments, but the practice of experienced advertisers is to advertise heavily when conditions are favorable for business, and in dull times to advertise just enough to keep their goods before the public, or sufficient to keep their salesmen busy.

Midsummer is the dullest period for most lines of business, but there are some that thrive best in hot weather, such as liveries, ice-cream parlors, and laundries.

It should not be a difficult matter for any retailer to decide what percentage of his business was done in each month of the previous year. His books should show this in dollars and cents. It will be a safe plan for him to distribute his advertising over the 12 months in about the same proportion, except that the weak months should be favored a little. Suppose, for instance, his books show that his business, month by month, for the previous year was proportioned as follows: January, 8 per cent.; February, 9 per cent.; March, 10 per cent.; April, 8 per cent.; May, 7 per cent.; June, 5 per cent.; July, 5 per cent.; August, 6 per cent.; September, 8 per cent.; October, 10 per cent.; November, 12 per cent.; December, 12 per cent.

Inasmuch as many of his fixed expenses, such as salaries, rent, insurance, etc., are the same in June as in December, it is apparent that if the percentage of business of these two months, for instance, could be more nearly equalized, it would be advantageous. Therefore, the advertiser might distribute his appropriation as follows: January, 8 per cent.; February, 9 per cent.; March, 10 per cent.; April, 8 per cent.; May, 8 per cent.; June, 6 per cent.; July, 6 per cent.; August, 7 per cent.; September, 8 per cent.; October, 9 per cent.; November, 10 per cent.; December, 11 per cent.

Of course these figures are assumed, for the sake of illustration. They might apply to one business and not to another, but in distributing an appropriation, these points should be borne in mind: First, in the busiest season, trade comes easily and returns from good advertising are immediate and tangible, but it is bad policy to advertise too heavily and thus draw more people to the store than can be profitably handled. The advertising should be sufficient to keep the store only full, not "jammed." Second, in dull seasons trade does not come easily and the advertising returns are as a rule intangible, but the money is not wasted. Dull-season advertising makes busy seasons busier. Such advertising gives the store publicity, and when people get ready to buy, they will go to the store whose advertisements have made the most favorable impression.

27. Distribution of Appropriation Among Mediums.—After deciding when, the next step is to determine how or where the appropriation is to be expended. The retailer may consider newspapers, street cars, outdoor displays, letters, circulars, novelties, and house publications. Just what percentage should be spent in each medium depends on the nature of the business. As a rule, however, the newspaper has the bulk of retail and local advertising.

CHANGING THE PLAN

28. Of course, when possible, it is well to decide in advance of or in the early part of the year just what can be spent for advertising, and when and in what mediums the allowance should be spent. But these general plans are usually subject to much change as the advertiser “feels his way.” The results of some special advertising may be such that the advertiser would be justified in immediately making an extra appropriation to be expended along the line of the successful plan. One medium may prove decidedly unprofitable and make further expenditure in that direction most inadvisable. Therefore, while it is always well to plan and to advertise systematically, the advertiser cannot afford to tie himself to any hard-and-fast plan. What he thinks in January to be the proper course for the year, may, before half the year passes, prove to be an unwise plan. Plans often have to be changed from month to month, as the advertiser gets more light on his problems.

CONTRACTING FOR SPACE

NEWSPAPERS

29. In contracting for newspaper space, it is well to remember that the paper with the lowest rate is not necessarily the cheapest; it is usually the most expensive, when circulation is considered.

Some advertisers, such as banks and laundries, are safe in contracting to use a certain amount of space daily or every other day or twice a week for a year, but most retailers should contract merely for a certain amount of space to be used at will. By this plan, the retailer can gauge his advertising according to weather conditions, current events, state of trade, condition of stock, etc. When he wants to use large advertisements, he will be at liberty to do so; when he feels it best to discontinue for a short time, there is nothing in the way. With the solicitor of the newspaper, the advertiser should come to a specific understanding as to the page and position for his advertisements, and when the advertisements are run, should then check carefully to see that he gets what he pays for.

Most papers have space discounts; that is, they give a lower rate for 5,000 or 10,000 lines of space than they do for 2,000 lines. The retailer should have a contract to the effect that in case he begins with the idea of using 2,000 lines, for instance, he shall have the 5,000-line rate for all space used, in the event that he shall use up to 5,000 lines.

30. Most small newspapers—and some large ones—are careless in setting and placing advertisements. The average compositor will either try to use too many styles of type and too much rule and ornament or else go to the other extreme and set up the advertisement carelessly with any style of type that may be at hand. This condition can be prevented by furnishing layouts with the copy or by threatening to cut off patronage if the copy is not set properly.

31. Profitable Use of Small Space.—Most retail advertisers use small space; that is, their advertisements rarely exceed 16 column inches. It really requires more skill to get satisfactory returns out of small space for a small store than to make large space profitable for a large store. Large advertisements attract the reader simply by their size and by the variety of articles offered for sale. But in writing small advertisements the ad-writer is restricted by lack of space and must get the very best value out of a few words, small illustrations, and small display type.

The best plan in using small space is to specialize on one article or on one line of articles in each advertisement. If several papers are used each day, then several articles or several different lines may be advertised each day. The advertiser should exercise his best judgment in selecting the articles to be advertised, using only such as are very desirable, because of style or price, or some other selling point. These leaders will draw the people to the store and give the clerks an opportunity to sell them a variety of articles. It is a mistake to attempt to run a department-store style of advertisement in space only large enough to present a few articles properly. Some of the most successful retailers in the country have increased their business largely through the use of 2- and 4-inch advertisements in the daily papers. Special position is of more value with small space than with large space. A large advertisement will be seen wherever it is placed, but the small advertisement must be favored.

32. Individuality in Appearance of Advertisements.—It is desirable to attain individuality in all advertisements, because in this way the hasty reader is enabled to recognize the advertisement of a favorite store at a glance. While the average woman might never notice the difference between De Vinne and Post Old Style, she is nevertheless more susceptible to tasteful typographical and illustrative effects than the average man. Care should therefore be exercised in the selection of a good face for the advertisements, but this one style of type should not be used continuously until it becomes "stale."

STREET CARS, POSTERS, AND SIGNS

33. Street cars are well adapted to various lines of retail advertising. Their use is dealt with fully in Street-Car Advertising.

Posters and outdoor signs are not so valuable to retailers as are other mediums, although they afford general publicity that is of value. The use of posters and outdoor signs is dealt with in Outdoor Advertising.

MISCELLANEOUS MEDIUMS

34. Retail advertisers are regarded as legitimate prey by every one that gets up a program, a directory, a time table, or anything of this nature. As pointed out in Mediums, the cost of advertising in practically all these mediums, though frequently small, is usually far beyond the real value. About the only exception is the theater program that is widely distributed, and even this is usually inferior to newspaper advertising. It is well to make a fair trial of theater programs, inserting advertisements of a distinct "store-news" character and changing copy frequently. Returns should be checked carefully. A restaurant that makes a specialty of after-theater dinners should find theater programs profitable mediums. Such advertisers as jewelers and retailers of hats, shoes, clothing, liquors, etc., should also be able to use theater programs profitably.

USE OF FORM LETTERS

35. Letters in imitation of typewriting, or form letters, that deal interestingly with the dealer's proposition and are mailed or delivered to old and prospective customers sometimes bring good results. Lists of names to which such letters may be sent may be made up from sales records or from directories. To get results, letters must contain more than a general plea for business.

There is an enterprising tailor that never fails, near the end of a season, to send out a letter to his patrons, telling them of the odd trousers patterns he has on hand and offering to make up one pair for $5.50 or two pair for $10 from the same measure at the same time. He writes as if he were giving them inside information of the sale before offering the patterns to the general public.

SAMPLING

36. In the case of a bakery, specimen loaves of the best bread could be left, as samples, at homes in the section from which the baker could reasonably hope to draw trade. Distributing samples is expensive, but it pays in the long run if the goods are of sufficient merit. No housewife with whom a loaf of fine-looking bread is left is going to throw it away; it will be tried, and if it is better than the bread she has been using, she is more than likely to buy the new bread regularly. A new baker could, of course, sample as thoroughly as his advertising appropriation allowed. An established bakery would pursue a different plan, leaving samples only at homes where it did not already have a customer.

Sometimes, grocers, in undertaking sampling campaigns of coffees, flour, etc., are able to get samples from the manufacturer. The retailer is trying to increase the sales of the brand, and it is only fair that the manufacturer should share the expense.

Checking carefully the value of each plan as he proceeds, the retailer should be able to determine what pays and what does not. The baker, for instance, might distribute 500 loaves in a given section and watch results carefully before going further with the sampling plan. After trying the distribution of the full-sized loaf, he might try the distribution of a small-sized loaf, with a ticket entitling the holder to a free full-sized loaf with the first purchase at the bakery. This plan would bring the prospective purchaser to the bakery.

CIRCULAR ADVERTISING

37. While the newspaper is the medium of the greatest value to the average retailer, there are many retailers so situated that they cannot use newspapers profitably. Take, for example, the case of a grocer, a baker, or a druggist in one end of a large place like Chicago, Philadelphia, or St. Louis. Being away from the central part of the city and dependent for trade on just one section of it, this retailer cannot afford to pay the rates of newspapers that circulate over the entire city. The section in which he can hope to get patronage probably does not constitute one-fiftieth part of the city's area. If, therefore, he uses newspapers that circulate over all the city, he pays for a circulation of which forty-nine fiftieths will do him no good. Sometimes, where an advertiser is located in a suburb of a city or in a near-by smaller city, the newspapers of the large city will give him special rates, but in many cases even the special rate makes advertising prohibitive.

Such a merchant has a hard problem to solve, but it is not unsolvable. Unless the distribution of circulars at the doors of homes is prohibited in his city, he can at intervals get out well-printed circulars describing his offers, much in the manner of a newspaper advertisement. He can have these circulars distributed by boys, he can send them through the mail, or he can send out one of the circulars with every package. He can also send out large mailing cards describing specialties.

38. Suppose, for instance, that a grocery store is to be advertised. A well-printed bulletin of the offerings of the store for the week might be made up with a title like "Browne's Grocery News," in the style of a little newspaper page, as shown in Fig. 7, which is intended merely to give a general idea. Following the methods of the large stores, the grocer may put up a leader for each day of the week, offering a well-known brand of soap at cost for one day of the week—limiting the number of bars sold to each customer—offering some other article of a standard nature for the next day, and so on for each day of the week. Of course, the grocer will make nothing on these specialties, but they will bring customers to the store and he will as a result get some of the regular trade of such customers.

Best of all, these bargain offers will insure the reading of the bulletin. The careful housewife is ever on the lookout to see how she can save a little of her allowance. If the grocer finds that too many come in to buy the specials, he can vary his offers by advertising on one day to give a 5-cent cake of Ivory soap with every 50-cent purchase; on another day, a bottle of good olives with every dollar purchase; etc. On these special offers the profit will be little or nothing, but the point is that they bring people to the store, and if the grocer's store and service are what they should be, he will be able to increase his regular trade steadily.

39. Supplementing the Newspaper Campaign With Circulars.—In general, the retailer should rely on newspaper advertising (and sometimes on car cards and theater programs) to create new customers. To help him hold these customers, he should do a certain amount of circular advertising. It is not enough to draw a new customer into the store for a bargain or a purchase at a regular price. Such a store as a piano store need make only one sale to a customer to do a successful business, but most retailers have to depend for profit on steady patronage. If no attempt is made to make regular customers out of the new people that come in, they may drift away to other stores. Circular advertising plays an important part in making steady customers out of new ones.

40. List of Customers.—Every retailer should know exactly who his customers are. He is aware that a pleased customer is the best advertisement, but usually makes no effort to please except when the customer is in the store with some money to spend. The retailer should learn from his mail-order competitor the value of good follow-up work. Many mail-order dealers will spend more to get a new name on their books than the first sale is worth. For instance, a dealer in art furniture advertised a plate rack for $1, delivered express prepaid. It actually cost him more than $1 when placed in the home of his customer, but he obtained through this offer the names of many persons interested in art furniture. By means of his follow-up system he hoped to make them permanent customers, and it is said that his plan was successful. The lesson to be learned from this is that the retailer does well to get the names and addresses of all customers, provided he can get the information tactfully. The name and address must always appear on the sales check when goods are to be delivered, and the information can also be obtained in most cases from customers that take their own packages. These names should be transferred to a card file. Then, each day the duplicate sales checks should be checked through, and whenever any new names appear they should be entered in the files.

With a complete card file of all his customers, the retailer is prepared to supplement the newspaper advertising by follow-up matter that will hold and develop trade. The principle of bargain advertising is to get the customer into the store. A woman may come in expecting to buy only the single bargain advertised, but the tempting counter displays and tactful salesmanship of the clerks usually cause her to buy articles that were not advertised. The retailer of a single line of goods can do much more than this. He can follow up his customer with mailed or distributed circular matter that will induce her to come again for more purchases. He can keep her informed of the arrival of new goods, invite her to attend openings or demonstrations, advise her of some very special bargains "not advertised in the newspapers, but announced to our regular customers only," etc. Such supplementary advertising is sure to retain customers and to build up a clientele of pleased purchasers that will stand by the store that stands by them. For the most effective operation of such a system, the card file of customers' names is essential. The ways of using such a list and the preparation of follow-up material will now be considered.

41. Method of Introducing New Goods.—A concern in New York advertised in the magazines for the names of women that desired to receive samples of the latest metropolitan dress fabrics. When the samples and descriptions were sent to inquirers, an effort was made to sell them some of the goods.

The retailer can utilize this scheme for introducing and popularizing new goods quickly. As soon as a shipment has been received, a description of the goods—with their use and price—should be printed on small envelope-size cards, which should be enclosed with samples of the goods and mailed to all the addresses in the file. The card might be headed “Special Sample Service for Blank and Company’s Regular Customers,” or something of that sort. Every woman likes to see samples and prices of new goods, and will be pleased at the attention given her by the firm. This circularization is more than likely to create or stimulate a desire for new apparel, which will result in more business. Often the manufacturer will furnish a card or folder that can be used in this way, and will print on such matter the name and address of the retailer.

42. Invitations to Sales.—A list of customers’ names is especially valuable in case of an opening or a special sale. A neat card or folder printed in imitation of an engraved invitation to a society event should be sent to each address in a plain, sealed envelope. In the case of customers that prefer to be waited on by some particular clerk, the invitation may be accompanied by the clerk’s personal card. As a change from the imitation of the social invitation card, the retailer can use effectively a neat letter printed in small typewriter type on a note sheet bearing the monogram of the store.

43. Package Circulars.—A very effective way of distributing any kind of circular matter is to enclose one copy in every package sent out from the store. In Fig. 8 is shown a circular that was used by a laundry. Only a small proportion of the readers of a newspaper advertisement become customers of the store, but these package circulars go only to customers, people that are familiar with the store and are most likely to purchase at some future time. The circular is found when the package is opened, at a time when the customer is interested in her purchases and in the store. It is likely to be read, and will be effective if it is brief and to the point. Such a circular might take the form of a weekly bulletin, in which the concern could list, say, half a dozen choice offerings for that week only. This scheme gives a small store a chance to operate the bargain idea on a small scale and to dispose of remnants or odds and ends of stock, the quantity of which would not warrant the expense of a newspaper advertisement. Such a bulletin could be printed on single sheets of good paper and headed "Blank and Company's Weekly Bulletin Service for Regular Customers Only."

Figs. 9 and 10 show examples of good folders to be sent out with goods or to be handed to customers. The illustrations show only the inside pages. In the original, the folder shown in Fig. 10 had an outside cover showing a Christmas wreath of holly with the berries in red. Note the sensible suggestions made regarding Christmas presents. This was a most seasonable circular.

44. Mail Folders.—The mail folder is to retail advertising what the booklet is to mail-order advertising. While few retailers can profitably use booklets, they should all send out at least two folders a year—spring and fall—and in a great many cases one each month could be made to pay well if properly prepared. The advantages of monthly

Gifts Worth the Giving

O THE GIFT. SO THE FRIENDSHIP. Frivolous tokens invariably mark a frivolous admiration; while gifts such as one finds in our magnificent assortment are wholly suggestive of affection of the truest sort. Always giveable gifts, always acceptable gifts. They're the only kind on show here.

The problem of choosing the right present vanishes the instant one gets amidst this vast assemblage. Look whichever way you will, you'll gaze on pertinent suggestions---for father, for mother, for sister and brother and the others likely to be remembered by you.

Strange indeed if one cannot find a token to satisfy both fancy and purse from an assortment so vast, so diversified and so modestly priced. It's the Mecca for discriminating Yuletide shoppers---unquestionably.

Walk in and look around.

folder distributions are: First, they continually remind regular customers that the advertiser wants to retain their trade; those who ask for anything are most likely to get it, and these monthly requests for business are likely to prevent the shifting of trade to other dealers. Second, they keep the advertiser's name and goods in the minds of prospective customers; when they are ready to purchase anything in his line they will be influenced to buy from him. Third, many people that do not regularly read the newspaper advertisements will read folders personally addressed and sent to them by mail.

The most economical and satisfactory form of folder is a sheet of rather heavy paper so printed and creased that it can be folded to about the size and shape of an ordinary envelope and can be mailed under a 1-cent stamp. Figs. 11, 12, 13, and 14 show open and folded shapes of several folders of this character. In those shown in Figs. 11 and 12, one of the folds slips into the other and is held by it. The folder shown in Fig. 14 has one fold trimmed to a point so that it can be inserted into a slit made in another fold. Those shown in Figs. 12 and 13 are held together by a 1-cent stamp. These are all good schemes, and the folders can be varied in size and style to suit the advertiser's requirements. As a rule, the printing is on one side only and in large type, but often the outside fold bearing the address and stamp is ornamented, or some catchy line or quotation relating to the goods is printed above or below the address. Such printing on the outside need not always "give away" the contents of the folder, but may be some general statement like "A penny saved is two pence earned," or "This is the stuff that dreams are made of," depending on the thought that the advertiser wishes to instil into the reader's mind before the folder is opened. The copy for the inside sheet should be about the same as that used for a newspaper advertisement, but it may be as bright or chatty in style as the writer can make it. The inside and the outside of a folder, illustrating the general style of matter used and the manner of folding, is reproduced in Figs. 15 and 16.

It should be remembered that folders cut in such unusual shapes as a miniature hat, a pumpkin, etc., will require the cutting of a special die, which will increase the cost of the job.

45. Post-Card Folder.—

Another form of folder that has recently been used to some extent is one in which a post card for reply is attached to the main sheet. Such folders must be so constructed that the post card when torn off will meet the post-office requirements as to thickness, size, and color. The folders shown in Figs. 13 and 14 may be made with post cards attached. The post card need not be attached, but may be enclosed in the folder. If the folder paper is fairly stiff, there is little likelihood of the card dropping out or being lost in the mail. Post-card folders are used only when a reply is desired. For instance, a piano dealer might send one to every local piano player, advertising his facilities for tuning, repairing, and moving pianos, and asking the recipients to fill out and send in the cards whenever they require his services. Or, a clothing dealer might advertise in a folder his new spring styles, and offer to send samples of clothing on receipt of a request on the card enclosed, etc. Card-system cards are sometimes used for this purpose, as they are about the right size and weight, and when returned they are placed in the card-file mailing list.

Such folders are especially valuable, almost indispensable, to the retailer that does a mail-order business with the residents of near-by towns or villages. The clothing dealer might consider it bad policy to offer to send samples to prospective customers that might otherwise come into the store to see the goods, but it would probably pay him to send them to prospective customers outside of the town. Fig. 17 is a reproduction of the inside pages of a folder sent out by a dry-goods house. Note the descriptions and prices, also the mail-order suggestion. Return post cards facilitate replies and give an advertiser some idea of the relative efficiency of the different pieces of advertising matter with which they may be sent out. Different tints of stock may be used on different occasions, or a figure or letter may be printed on the card, so that when a card is returned it may be easily determined in which circular it was sent.

46. Post Cards.—Regarding the size, form, quality, etc. of post cards, the Postmaster General, under date of March 2, 1907, sent out the following order:

Section 418 of the Postal Laws and Regulations is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 418. Private mailing cards ("post cards") in the domestic mails must conform to the following conditions:

(a) A "post card" must be an unfolded piece of cardboard not exceeding 9 centimeters by 14 centimeters (approximately 3 9-16 in.

by 5 9-16 in.) nor less than 7 centimeters by 10 centimeters (approximately 2 3-4 in. by 4 in.), as shown by the following diagram:

(b) It must in form and in the quality and weight of paper be substantially like the Government postal card.

(c) It may be of any color not interfering with a legible address and postmark.

(d) It may or may not, at the option of the sender, bear near the top of the face the words "Post Card."

(e) The face of the card may be divided by a vertical line; the left half to be used for message, etc., but that to the right for the address only.

(f) Very thin sheets of paper may be attached to the card, and then only on condition that they completely adhere thereto. Such sheets may bear both writing and printing.

(g) Advertisements and illustrations may appear on the back of the card and on the left half of the face.

2. Cards, without cover, conforming to the foregoing conditions are transmissible in the domestic mails (including the possessions of the United States) and to Cuba, Canada, Mexico, the Republic of Panama, and the United States postal agency at Shanghai, China, at the postage rate of 1 cent each.

3. When post cards are prepared by printers and stationers for sale, it is desirable that they bear in the upper right-hand corner of the face an oblong diagram containing the words "Place postage stamp here," and at the bottom of the space to the right of the vertical dividing line, the words "This space for the address."

4. Cards that do not conform to the conditions prescribed by these regulations are, when sent in the mails, chargeable with postage according to the character of the message—at the letter rate, if wholly or partly in writing, or at the third-class rate, if entirely in print.

5. Cards bearing particles of glass, metal, mica, sand, tinsel, or other similar substances, are unmailable, except when enclosed in envelopes, or when treated in such manner as will prevent the objectionable substances from being rubbed off or injuring persons handling the mails,

RATES OF POSTAGE ON PIECES OF LEATHER, WOOD, BARK, ETC., PURPORTING TO BE "POST CARDS"

Pieces of leather, wood, bark, or other material other than paper, purporting to be post cards and bearing no written additions unauthorized by Section 483, Postal Laws and Regulations, when sent in the mails unsealed are chargeable with postage at the fourth-class rate—one cent an ounce or fraction thereof. (Section 480 and 481, Postal Laws and Regulations.)

Such matter, bearing written additions unauthorized by Section 483, Postal Laws and Regulations, when mailed is subject to postage at the first-class rate—two cents an ounce or fraction thereof. (Section 413, Postal Laws and Regulations.)

Cards bearing the words "United States of America" have been declared illegal, it being held that they are in the nature of counterfeits of the government postal cards.

Fig. 18 shows a post card used by a men's furnishing store to announce the arrival of new hats. This advertiser took advantage of the popularity of post cards, and his card was printed on high-grade stock. While the body matter is not so legible as it would be if set in upper- and lower-case letters, there is very little of the matter and the caps lend a distinctiveness.

47. Mailing Cards.—In many cases where folders might be considered too expensive, mailing cards can be used. A mailing card and folder of the same size and made of the same stock would cost about the same, but it is customary to make a folder much more elaborate than a mailing card. High-grade stock and usually two colors of ink are used for folders. Frequently, the address side carries some ornament or type matter. A mailing card, on the other hand, is usually printed on only one side of cheap stock, and in one color. Hence, mailing-card advertising is usually less expensive than folder advertising, and the cards can be sent out more frequently. Mailing cards possess most of the advantages of folders, but are less personal.

Mailing cards should not be confounded with post cards. A mailing card is simply an unfolded piece of printed matter, subject to third-class postage rates. A post card is first-class matter that must conform to the requirements set forth in Art. 46. A mailing card may be of any size, color, or stock. It is inadvisable to use a card larger than about 6 inches by 9 inches, since a larger card, especially if made from stiff stock, is liable to become mutilated in transit. A tough, pliable stock is best. Rounding the corners of a card reduces the likelihood of their being broken off or bent.

Good typographical arrangement and color combination, and, if the additional expense is warranted, an attractive and pertinent illustration will add much to the effectiveness of a mailing card, even if cheap stock is used. The address side may be utilized, but sufficient space must be left for a legible address and the necessary postage stamp. As a matter of economy, however, it is customary to use only the back, and only one color of ink. A two-color effect may be secured by using colored stock. In Fig. 19 is shown a reproduction of a unique mailing card. As this card was cut in the shape of a hat, a special die was required.

A mailing card may be used where a reply is desired, for a reply card can be attached, but the card is then essentially a folder. Such a combination card must be so printed and folded that it will not be mistaken for other than third-class matter. The address side of the reply card must be folded inside. The reply card must comply with all the rules and regulations for post cards.

48. Booklets.—In retail advertising, booklets are little used, but many concerns could profitably use one general booklet. For instance, a bank might use one that would explain all about the different kinds of financial service it was prepared to render. Few people thoroughly understand all the functions of banks, and it would pay such institutions to spread this information.

Most of the booklets now used in retail advertising are furnished by the manufacturers of various lines carried by the retailer. But the latter's firm name and store address is printed in a blank space provided for the purpose, and to all intents and purposes the booklets become his own and can be sent to his mailing list with profit.

Booklets of the better class are rather costly. Sometimes, however, the business done by a retailer justifies the printing of a good booklet. In Fig. 20 is shown a reproduction of two inside pages of a fall booklet sent out by a clothing and men's furnishing store. This circular consisted of 12 pages bound in a tasteful cover, and it was sent to all the names on the store's mailing list of customers.

49. Distribution of Circulars by Mail.—The two items of cost in the distribution of circulars by mail are addressing and postage. The addresses may be written on a typewriter, but, if the circulars are to be sent to women, handwritten addresses are preferable. The cost of addressing is very small, and, when done in time that would otherwise be wasted, it need not be considered.

Postage is often the largest item of expense, and must be considered in determining the size of the circular or booklet. Two ounces of printed matter may be mailed unsealed for 1 cent. If a booklet and its envelope weighs only 1 ounce, it will require a 1-cent postage stamp. It is a good thing to remember that it costs just as much to address and mail a poorly written, poorly printed "dodger" as it does to mail a fine booklet weighing less than 2 ounces.

The retailer that considers this point makes his mail advertising produce sales at less cost by spending more money on his printing, than another that shaves the printing cost, but still must pay full postage rates for an inferior circular. Thus, a thousand circulars costing $4 will require $10 postage; total, $14. A thousand fine booklets costing $25 may also be mailed for $10; total, $35. The booklets, mailed, would cost little more than twice as much as the circulars, but might perhaps be five to ten times as productive.

50. Distribution of Circulars by Messengers, Etc. Distribution of circulars by messengers is sometimes cheaper than by mail, especially when it can be done by office boys that would not otherwise be busy. But experienced advertisers claim that the better service given by grown men warrants the higher cost. The cost depends on the character of the territory to be covered and on the amount and size of the matter to be distributed. For exclusively house-to-house distribution of ordinary-sized matter, the rate in cities and towns is from $2 to $3 per thousand pieces; while for country routes it may be from 50 cents to $2 per thousand higher. If the distribution is general, that is, includes business places, the rate is usually somewhat lower than for house-to-house service. In cities and towns, daily reports of the work done are usually furnished to the advertiser.

The rates for distributing samples are from $1 to $4 higher (depending on size and weight) than for other matter.

To determine the number of pieces of advertising matter required to cover a town of 10,000 or less, divide the number of inhabitants by 4; the result will represent the number of homes, approximately. For large cities, the divisor should be about 5. In some cities, there are regulations forbidding the house-to-house distribution of circular matter.

SALES PLANS

VALUE OF SPECIAL SALES PLANS

51. No merchant can afford to carry over from season to season goods that deteriorate. He will do well to get rid of them at cost or nearly cost, because he can always be sure of regular patronage from some of those who come in to buy specially advertised articles. The special sale solves this problem. The special sale also provides a means of moving merchandise in the middle of the season, when the retailer has too many goods on hand and needs money more than he needs stock.

To do the most successful business, the retailer must keep before the public. Therefore, in addition to the extra business that a special event of any kind brings, there is a certain amount of profitable publicity that comes through the public interest taken in the store's operations. Special sales and events may be made profitable even when there are no goods on hand that will suffer by age or deterioration.

When handled carefully, the special-sale idea is of never-ending value to the retailer. If it is handled carelessly or overworked, it becomes a drawback rather than a help; and while it may cause a temporary increase of sales it will work great injury to future business. If a store, for instance, should advertise a closing-out sale or a removal sale and not afterwards close out or change the place of business, public confidence in the statements of the advertiser would be greatly decreased. Some merchants succeed by tricky methods, but a lasting, increasing success is much more likely to be achieved by dealing honestly with the public.

52. While the value of public attention is undisputed, if it be favorable attention, the retailer, before proceeding with any prize offer, guessing contest, or any other novel plan, should be sure that the attention attracted will be of the kind likely to result in more business for him. A man wearing a straw hat and no coat and walking along the streets in mid-winter with an advertisement of a haberdasher on his back, will attract much attention, but such a scheme will probably sell no goods. Thousands of misguided retailers try such "funny stunts" as these with the idea that attracting public attention is good advertising. It must be a particular kind of attention to be of value. Otherwise, it may only amuse people, or it may even disgust them.

A hat store, for example, with a window full of new goods fixes up a piece of timber so that it looks as if it had broken the window and is sticking through. A notice is pasted on the window, offering a reward for the imaginary miscreant that did the breaking. Such a scheme attracts much attention, but it actually distracts attention from the goods in the window. People walk away, feeling that they have been fooled, and this "fooling" policy is not likely to lead them to the store to buy hats.

53. Conducting a Sale.—When a special sale is on, the window displays, counter displays, and inside decorations should conform to and support the advertising. The salesmen should be ready to support earnestly every statement made in the advertisements. To do this, they must be systematically informed of what is to be advertised. Everything must be carefully planned in advance so that there will be no hitches nor delays. The advertising of a sale should be heaviest at the start, so that it will be surely noticed and make people think and talk. If the sale is of special importance, it sometimes pays to announce its approach by reading notices, street-car advertisements, circulars, or invitations sent to selected lists of names. One good way of distributing such special notices is to wrap one up in every package that leaves the store. Each one thus goes into the hands of a customer and is received at a time when it is likely to be carefully read. During the progress of a sale, there should be no lack of enthusiasm either in the advertising or on the part of the salespeople. In fact, it is easier to start a sale well than to keep it going until its purpose is fully accomplished. Every succeeding day's advertisement should bring out some new and strong feature written up, illustrated, and displayed in a manner a little different from that of the preceding advertisement. The sale should, of course, be dropped as soon as it fails to draw the crowd, unless it can possibly be revived by the introduction of some new feature or by a further cut in the prices; but such a change in plan must be made with care, so as not to create the impression that the sale has been a failure. Few sales can be made to pay for more than two weeks, and even when they might pay, a change in the advertising will probably be advantageous. It requires a great deal of skill on the part of the ad-writer to prepare fresh, strong, different advertisements of the same sale for more than twelve consecutive days. Then, too, it is difficult to maintain for more than two weeks the interest and enthusiasm of the public. The most effective way of conducting a sale covering two weeks, is to advertise it strongly every other day, with a direct but brief reference to it on the alternate days.

A sale can be dropped by a final close-out cut in prices on odd lots, odd sizes, soiled garments, remnants, etc., the advertising space devoted to the announcement depending on the amount of "left overs" on hand and their salability.

THE BARGAIN OFFER

54. Nearly all special sales are based on the bargain offer; in most cases, the bargain is the kernel of the nut. The advertiser may announce a sale of odd sizes, a lot of left-overs, a bankrupt stock, or an anniversary event, but the strong selling point is, "here is your chance to get something at a much lower figure than the usual price."

The real bargain will always be a strong factor of retail advertising. No store ever made a fortune by selling goods at cost or thereabouts, but no other idea brings so many people to the store as the bargain idea, and with the store full of people, sales of other goods at regular prices will be made. Most people are glad to save money on all purchases. The instinct is strong, and it is really wonderful how far some persons will go to save even a few cents or to get something for which they do not have to pay.

55. Three Classes of Bargains.—There are three classes of bargains that constitute advertising material: (1) unsalable stock on which the price is cut in order to close it out; (2) salable goods on which the price is cut in order to provide an advertising leader, and (3) seasonable goods that are purchased at advantageous prices.

SUGGESTIVE SALES PLANS

56. Success in retailing is obtained, not by following the beaten track—that is, doing what others do—but by proceeding along new and better lines. In retail advertising, as in mail-order and general advertising, it is sometimes the case that the plan of selling commands more interest and has more selling force than the goods or the service. While the advertiser should always be on his guard against any sensational plans that may produce an unfavorable impression, he should be alert to use any special plan that will command public interest and result in increased business. The progressive merchant should not be bound by precedent nor confine himself to overworked methods. He can learn much by studying the plans and experiences of the progressive merchants of other communities, but he should try to improve such plans. This part of advertising work requires considerable merchandizing ability, as it is usually more difficult to devise a good selling plan than to write an effective advertisement after the plan is determined.

The following brief outlines of a number of successful sales plans are intended only as suggestions of what an alert local advertiser may do in arousing the public.

57. Charity Sales.—In the charity sale, the plan is to give a small percentage of the store's total sales for a week to the benevolent organizations of the city. The organizations are interested long before the sale is announced, and committees from each not only work to get all their friends to buy that week, but are at the store during the sale. Something about each organization is published in the advertisement, and where the number is sufficient, there is a special day for each organization. The success of each sale depends more on the aggressive work of the charity committees than on the advertising, although large advertisements must be used daily during the sale.

58. Twenty-Five Cent Sales.—In a 25-cent sale, a great many different things that sell usually at a little more than 25 cents are marked down to 25 cents and assembled in various parts of the store. Some first-class bargains are put out along with other goods that have not been selling well, and which the store would like to get off the shelves. The same idea may be worked out in 50-cent sales and dollar sales. In some towns, merchants have combined in having a special "dollar day" and have brought in much rural trade.

59. Hourly Sales.—The hourly sale is an old idea, but is one that has been used with much success. Bargains of various kinds are offered for one hour only, though it is customary to have one bargain good for one hour and others good for the following hours. Promptly on the minute, the sale of the article at the special price is stopped. The plan is best suited to stores that carry a variety of small merchandise. A variation of this idea is to have the price on some article start low and advance every hour, while the price on some other article starts at the regular figure and decreases every hour. Bulletins on the counters are used to show the change in prices.

60. Anniversary sales, opening sales, inventory sales, closing-out-season sales, etc. are all conducted on the same general plan. The store takes advantage of its opening day, its anniversary, or its inventory taking to offer some special bargains, a prize of some kind to the drawer of a lucky ticket, etc. In anniversary advertisements, it is appropriate to tell of the success of the store since its inception, due to careful buying and low prices, etc.

61. Bankrupt-Stock Sales.—The bankrupt-stock sale is old idea too, but it is one that always draws a crowd if the bankrupt stock that the store has purchased is really full of bargains and they are well advertised. To inspire confidence, the name of the bankrupt store whose goods have been purchased should be given.

62. Fire Sales.—The fire sale is seldom effective unless the smoke or water damage to goods is very slight, or merely spoils their fresh and new appearance. This sort of sale has also been greatly abused by cheap concerns. On the slightest pretext they have offered their entire stock as "slightly damaged," when in reality most of it was as good as ever, and the advertised cut in prices was only imaginary.

63. Business Changes.—Special sales are frequently run to reduce stock, and thus increase the cash balance, on account of dissolution of partnership, retirement from business, sale of business, removal, rebuilding, or alteration of buildings. Each of these occasions furnishes good talking points for a special sale. They are particularly valuable when they occur in dull business periods, as is most likely to be the case. Business changes of this kind afford material for good news items in the papers. These items help the regular advertising very much and should not be neglected.

64. Manufacturers' Job-Lot, or Mill-End, Sales. Near the close of a season, job lots of goods may be had from manufacturers at a heavy discount, sometimes for 50 per cent. of the original price. When these are well advertised, they are sure to bring the bargain hunters. Tags may be used on the goods, showing the price at the beginning of the season and the price at the time of the sale. The talk may be about how the manufacturer wished to make room for new stock, etc. Tom Murray, the famous retailer of Chicago, once advertised for some days previous to a special sale that he would buy from any clothing manufacturer "1,000 more suits at $9 as good as those we are now selling at $10." It was a convincing way of showing that he was making only $1 on a suit.

65. Gift Sales.—There are many different kinds of gift sales. One plan is to assemble slow-selling goods of various classes and to allow the person that makes a purchase from the lot to make a selection of any other article of the lot as a gift.

66. Old-Hat and Old-Shoe Sales.—Hat stores and shoe stores have stimulated sales by offering to pay 25 cents or more for the old hat or the old shoes that the customer has on.

67. Odd-Lot Sales.—Near the close of the season, many stores will have odd sizes of clothing, shoes, hats, etc. on hand. By offering special prices and advertising judiciously, these odd sizes will always be the means of bringing new customers. Those whom the odd sizes fit are usually pleased with their purchases and are likely to come in again.

68. Druggists' Special Sales.—A New York drug store has shown what a druggist can do in the way of attracting buyers. This store carries a varied stock of such specialties as shaving outfits, sponges, candies, cigars, etc., and there is scarcely a day that something new in this line is not offered in the show window at a special price. At the Christmas season, its offering of toilet articles is especially good. The special prices keep a stream of people in the store. Another drug store makes a specialty of 29-cent candy on Saturday only.

69. Extra-Trousers Offer.—One large tailoring firm with a chain of stores has made a success of the extra-trousers offer. Near the end of the season, when it takes unusual effort to move the goods still on hand, the prices are cut, and to all that buy within a limited time an extra pair of trousers is given. As the coat and vest of a suit usually outwear the trousers, this offer is attractive to the great middle class of buyers.

70. Special Price on Enlarged Pictures.—A large photographic store at least once every year offers to enlarge and frame Kodak pictures for 25 cents, the usual charge being 50 cents. While, perhaps, little profit is made at the reduced price, new customers are gained.

71. Special Price on Rug Cleaning.—To demonstrate its work, a carpet- and rug-cleaning establishment now and then offers to clean one rug for a new customer at half price.

72. Free Shoe-Shining Service.—Many shoe stores have their own bootblacks, and either make it a part of the sale that the customer may come in at any time and have his shoes shined free or give a ticket good for twenty shines.

73. Distributing Free Pay Envelopes.—A number of savings banks have followed the plan of furnishing the paymasters of factories and other industrial firms with free pay envelopes having the advertisement of the bank printed on the back. As the firms get the envelopes free of charge, and as a rule like to encourage thriftiness in their employes, it is easy for the bank to get in an effective advertisement at an opportune time.

74. Free Sandwich Offer.—A new quick-lunch restaurant on its opening day gave every visitor a free Virginia-ham sandwich. This feature was advertised in the newspapers as well as by moving signs on the streets near the restaurant. The sandwich was unusually good and the advertisement brought many permanent patrons.

75. Free First-Night Tickets.—A new amusement park tested the value of newspaper advertising, helped the paper to increase its circulation temporarily, and got a large crowd on its opening night, by printing a coupon in its advertisement that was good for one admission to the park.

76. Prize Schemes.—A great variety of prize plans has been worked out as an aid to retail advertising.

Clothing stores have given away savings banks, with a first deposit of 25 cents, to every purchaser of a boy's suit. Arrangements were made with a local savings bank to receive these accounts.

Book and stationery stores have, at the Christmas season, offered a year's subscription to any of the popular magazines as a premium to those who made purchases of certain amounts.

An aggressive piano firm advertised that it would give a $400 piano to one of the visitors to their store during a certain month. All that visitors had to do was to write their names and addresses on tickets and drop them into a large box. At the end of the month the box was well shaken and a ticket withdrawn. The holder of the ticket was awarded the piano. Each holder of the next ten tickets drawn was awarded a credit-due bill of $50 on a piano if it was purchased within 30 days. The scheme was to get the names of people that were interested in owning a piano. Through this plan, the salesmen of the store were able to double their usual sales for several months thereafter.

All such schemes of this kind, however, partake of the nature of a lottery and cannot be advertised in papers sent through the mails. But if a newspaper is delivered at homes or sold on the street, the post-office authorities cannot interfere. Even when the newspaper is sent through the mails, the advertisement in it may announce that a piano or other article is to be given away and may refer readers to the store for particulars.

77. Trading-Stamp Offers.—The trading-stamp plan has enjoyed the greatest popularity of any prize-giving system. By this plan, every time a purchaser buys something at a store that gives trading stamps, he receives trading stamps equal to the amount of his purchase. These stamps can be taken to the office of the trading-stamp company and exchanged for a premium. Of course, the trading-stamp company will not arrange with all the stores of a city, but those with which it does contract will gain a certain class of trade.

78. Coupon Schemes.—Closely akin to the trading-stamp idea is the plan of issuing coupons to customers. When a certain number of these coupons has been acquired, the coupons may be returned to the store and exchanged for various premiums. Tobacco dealers and many other retailers have used this plan successfully. The advantage of a store having its own coupon-and-premium system, is that it may do its own premium buying and be sure of what the customer will receive. There is some advantage, too, in having the premiums displayed in the store.

79. Guessing and Competitive Contests.—There is almost an endless variety of guessing and competitive contests. Some examples are: Guessing the number of words that will appear in the firm's advertisement during a given month; supplying a word that has been left out of a published sentence; guessing the number of seeds in a pumpkin, etc. Prizes have also been offered for the best advertisement written by a reader of the newspaper, for the best reason for the superiority of the store, for the best letter on a specified subject written by a schoolboy or a schoolgirl, and so on.

In preparing any scheme of this kind, the details should be put before the local postmaster in order that he may decide whether it is prohibited by the laws against lotteries. If it is prohibited, the newspapers can be used only to call attention to the offer, and the readers will have to call at the store for particulars.

80. Cooperative Advertising.—The merchants' associations in a number of cities have worked very successful plans to get customers within a radius of 25 or 50 miles to come to town at special times. The inducement offered is to pay the fare of any one that comes in and buys at least $25 worth of merchandise from any merchant that joins in the plan. All that the visiting customer has to do in order to get his railroad fare refunded is to show the sales slip for his purchase of $25 or more and his return ticket. This plan, when a number of merchants participate, brings in a big rural and small-town trade. Of course, such events are widely advertised, the windows being trimmed specially and every needed preparation made.

81. It is entirely practicable for merchants to cooperate in getting out a store paper to be mailed to buyers that cannot be reached by the newspapers. A furniture store, a hardware store, a dry-goods store, and a clothing store may participate and divide the cost of printing and distribution. Such cooperation will help rather than hurt individual interests.

82. Some of the large hotels of Atlantic City, N. J., put their money together and are thus able to do more toward advertising Atlantic City as a great resort than if each advertised independently. Of course, each of these cooperative advertisements contains a list of all the hotels sharing in the campaign.

RETAIL MANAGEMENT

SPECIALTY STORES

DEPARTMENT-STORE COMPETITION

1. The strongest competitor of the specialty store in a city of good size is the department store, which sells almost everything under one roof and is unceasing in its bargain offers. A woman will go to a department store to buy a hosiery bargain. Stopping in the cloak department, she sees some garment that pleases her; in a few minutes the department store has made another sale, and the cloak-and-suit firm in the next block has lost the trade of this woman for the season.

The department store has not cut into the trade of specialty stores because it is more attractive, for it is probably not so attractive to a large proportion of the people as the specialty store. The department store has forged ahead because of its superior merchandizing and advertising methods. That this is true is shown by the fact that the progressive specialty stores have not been hurt noticeably by department-store competition.

The department store, on account of its large sales, is undoubtedly able in some of its departments to buy at lower prices than can the specialty store, but this is not true in all its departments, nor usually in most of them. The specialty store has in its favor the fact that it carries, as a rule, a better and more varied line of its particular class of goods than does the department store. Some manufacturers of high-grade goods will not sell to department stores at all, but prefer to have the leading specialty dealer as their local agent; this gives the specialty store prestige. The general impression in most cities is that the department stores, while cheaper in price, do not handle the highest grade of goods. There is much to encourage this impression, although a few department stores have educated the people up to a different belief. Most department stores buy job lots and bankrupt stocks now and then to sell off as bargains, deal in "seconds" in such things as hosiery, etc.

Although the proprietor of the specialty store will not do well to spend money advertising the disadvantages of department-store buying, he can take advantage of the general impression that his store is the best place to buy a hat, a watch, or a refrigerator, as the case may be. In the large cities, there are thousands of well-to-do persons that do not care to be seen in the department stores nor to have the wagons of the popular-priced department stores stop at their homes. All this is in favor of the specialty store.

Lower prices and better advertising may be said, therefore, to be the reasons for the inroads of the department store on the trade of the specialty stores. Price is a powerful lever in retail merchandizing. A housekeeper may prefer to get her shoes at a well-appointed shoe store, but when a high-grade shoe is advertised for sale by the department store at 75 cents lower than the usual price, she joins the crush at the big store and saves 75 cents on her purchase.

2. Lessons Taught by the Department Store.—The remedy for the specialty store is to "fight the devil with fire"; that is, to copy so far as is practicable the methods of the department store. A comparison of specialty-store advertising with department-store advertising usually shows that department-store copy is vastly superior so far as the giving of definite information is concerned. To verify this statement, Figs. 1 and 2 should be observed. The panels shown are taken from department-store page advertisements. How many millinery stores or photographic stores would put such definite information into their advertisements?

The average millinery store would announce that a new lot of fashionable ribbons, embracing all styles and prices, had arrived, and would extend a cordial invitation to all to come in and see them, an advertisement that sounds well but conveys very little definite information. The woman that must buy where she can buy to the best advantage, takes her purse, and with a picture in her mind of what the department store has, often goes there first.

The average photographic store will simply advertise that it has a complete line of Kodaks and Premos at prices from $4 up, and that it carries "everything in the way of photographic materials." Therefore, when definite advertisements like the panel shown in Fig. 2 appear in the papers, it is plain why the photographic department of the big store draws trade.

3. In Fig. 3 is shown a common type of the specialty shoe-store advertisement, while in Fig. 4 is shown an example of what a specialty shoe-store advertisement may be if the advertiser gives his advertising the thought it should receive. There is nothing to prevent the specialty store from having its special-price offering, nor is there any reason for not going into particulars in describing exactly what it has and also stating some prices. regularly such advertisements as those shown in Figs. 4, 5, and 6 need have no fear of department-store competition.

Of course, it is to the interest of the specialty store to have its service brought as nearly as possible to perfection, so that the difference between it and the crowded department store may be apparent. Having fewer clerks to control, the proprietor of the specialty store should be able to train them better. It is an easy matter for him to keep his clerks "keyed up" to the advertising, and as this is almost impossible in most department stores, the specialty store has an advantage. If the specialty-store proprietor does not attend to all these matters he can hardly hope to strengthen the general public impression that when price and quality are about equal, it is better to deal with the specialty store.

Red Cross Shoes Mean Comfort

It's the constant rubbing of the sensitive sole of your foot against the stiff sole of your shoe that makes your feet hurt--makes the flesh draw and burn.

The sole of the Red Cross Shoe, though of regular thickness, is flexible. It bends when the foot bends--follows every movement, just as a glove moves with the hand. The leather is tanned with genuine oak bark by a process that takes six months--all its life and "spring" are preserved. Your feet never burn, draw, or ache in the Red Cross Shoe. It is absolutely comfortable, enabling you to stand or walk for hours without tiring.

The Red Cross Shoe is made in glazed kid, calfskin, tan and patent leathers in all the latest, fashionable lasts. Can be obtained nowhere else in the city but at our store.

Black Taffeta Skirts

The white shirt waist and black taffeta skirt will be more popular this season than ever before.

Especially during the Exposition will there be a strong demand for something nice and dressy in a light-weight, black taffeta skirt.

Many people will wait until the last minute before buying; then it's too late to consult dressmakers. A skirt of this kind fills the bill exactly and saves a lot of worry and bother.

These skirts are made of an excellent quality of an especially light-weight taffeta, affording the greatest amount of comfort for summer wear. Made in the season's most approved styles.

A good one for $10. Others at $15 and up to $20.

MAIL-ORDER COMPETITION

4. Retailers in the smaller cities and towns come into sharp competition with the large, general mail-order concerns, or "catalog houses," as they are popularly called. These large companies, by aggressive advertising, good catalogs, low prices on articles of general consumption, and fair treatment of customers, have cut deeply into retail trade over the country generally. They sell almost everything from "a needle to a threshing machine," but their competition has worked the greatest injury to retailers that sell such articles as stoves, furniture, carpets, harness, vehicles, large hardware of all kinds, clothing, etc. The only reason that they do not encroach more on retail trade in single sales of articles of very small price, is that freight and express charges make the cost to the purchaser rather high. Some of the large mail-order houses discourage the sending of orders amounting to less than $1. Of course, articles that are not bulky and are light in weight can be sent readily through the mails, and safe delivery can be assured by registering. When the United States has a parcel-post system, as it may some day, the competition of the mail-order houses with the retailer will be sharper on small articles than it is now.

Merchants of the larger cities do not have to contend with the competition of the mail-order houses to any appreciable extent. These merchants carry such assortments of goods, give so good store service, and do such advertising that their customers see nothing to gain by sending money away. In fact, the mail-order firms do not care to send their catalogs to persons in such cities as New York, Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, etc. This means that when merchants of smaller cities have copied so far as is practicable the methods of the best merchants of large cities, they will have much less to fear from the mail-order concerns.

5. Reason for the Competition.—The plain truth about competition of this kind is that the small-city merchant has himself largely to blame for allowing the mail-order house to cut into his trade. The merchants that complain most about this competition are the ones that have neglected to study up-to-date methods of merchandizing. They have either had no window displays at all or have allowed poor displays to remain until covered with dust and dead flies. Their merchandise has been allowed to remain hidden behind the counter or in the loft of the store, and customers, not knowing that the goods could be obtained at home, have sent away for merchandise and have thus acquired the "mail-order habit." The merchant that suffers most from mail-order competition has probably had an advertisement running in the home paper without change for a month, and this advertisement has undoubtedly been set ineffectively in about five styles of display type, informing the readers—if, indeed, any one ever reads his stale announcements—that he carries a full line of home furnishings and that every one would save money by calling on him—no particulars, no descriptions, no prices. He would not dream of trying to sell goods in the store by repeating such general statements over and over without change; yet he does it serenely in his advertising, while mail-order papers that go into the same homes as the local paper, contain advertisements that describe goods well and give prices, or offer catalogs that give full descriptions.

The average small-city merchant will let goods become shopworn and out of style before he will put them out as bargains. When he does have a bargain sale, it is usually managed badly, not announced far enough ahead, and not supported properly by the display windows and the price tickets. Furthermore, he does not offer real bargains nor enough of them to gain a reputation of making only small profits. The windows are often positively dirty, the sign can hardly be read, the store is poorly arranged for showing goods, the clerk service is often indifferent, and delivery service of any kind is lacking entirely; yet the merchant of such a store is the one that will be most vindictive in denouncing mail-order buying and selling.

6. Advantages Over the Mail-Order Houses.—It is true that the small-city merchant cannot always meet the prices of the large mail-order firms. He can rarely meet the prices they make on their leaders; but he has much in his favor. He knows his customers; they are strangers to the mail-order house. He can talk to prospective buyers; the mail-order house must put its appeal in cold type. He can show the goods themselves and let the customer examine the goods that are being purchased; the mail-order house can give only a picture. He can deliver at once; goods shipped on a mail order are subject to annoying delay, and there are charges to be paid. The retailer is on the ground to make good his guarantee, exchange, etc.; while the mail-order houses try to do this, it means much trouble and expense to pack, ship back, and exchange a pair of shoes, a suit of clothes, or a refrigerator. The retailer knows the standing of many of his customers and can extend credit when expedient; the mail-order house requires either that cash be paid in advance or that the goods be sent C. O. D., and C.-O.-D. examination is often unsatisfactory. If the retailer takes advantage of all the points in his favor, he should be able to make more than a strong fight. Of course, the plan of warding off mail-order competition is easier than combating it successfully after the "mail-order habit" has been formed among a good proportion of the retailer's customers, but it is never too late to mend.

7. Method of Meeting Competition.—The retailer should first make critical examination of his store, his goods, his policy, and his service; that is, have a general house cleaning. If he expects to compete with wide-awake, progressive mail-order houses, he must change himself into a wide-awake, progressive merchant. He must be prepared to meet mail-order advertisers at every point, but he cannot do this with the store and methods of the average retailer. If he is a furniture dealer he should keep a scrap book or a series of envelopes into which he should file all the good furniture advertisements he sees. It is not advisable for him to copy the work of others, but such a file will suggest ideas. The retailer is likely to get into a rut if he sees no advertising but the work of the merchants of his own town. He should subscribe for the leading trade journals of his line, in order that he may learn what plans progressive retailers are following, and should get the catalogs of the mail-order houses in order that he may inform himself. In many instances, he will find that when express or freight charges have been added, the mail-order house charges as much as he does or more. Sometimes, he will find that where the price of the mail-order house is lower, the article is inferior to the one he carries. This will afford material for talks in his store or in his advertisements to those inclined to buy by mail. If he is aggressive, he may be able to find some case where a customer of a mail-order house got the wrong size and had much trouble in exchanging, or found that the article was not so good as described. All this may be used to advantage as advertising material. The retailer will, of course, emphasize those articles on which he can meet or more than meet the mail-order prices, and say nothing about others. He may not be able to meet the prices on the leaders of the mail-order house, but if he knows that he cannot buy closely enough to meet the price, he can have a few leaders of his own and cut under the mail-order price. The mail-order house draws trade by selling some particular article at cost or under. Why should not the retailer follow the same plan?

8. Cooperation of Local Editors.—The retailer should strive to interest local editors in inducing the people to spend their money at home. Care should be taken not to abuse the mail-order firm or its patrons, because every one is entitled to buy where he can do so to the best advantage. Nevertheless, it can be shown in good-spirited editorials that money sent to a far-away city does the home town and home county no good; that local business, schools, roads, bridges, etc. suffer by such a policy; that the home merchant gives credit and carries people over critical periods, and that it is only fair to give him a chance at the cash trade also; that the home merchant buys the farmers' produce, and it is only a fair turn for the farmers to deal with the home merchant. All persons should be urged to give the home merchant at least a chance to show what he has. It should be pointed out that even if the home merchant does not have the goods in stock, he can get what the customer wants just as easily as the customer can get it from a mail-order house.

The retailer cannot, of course, carry a stock as large as that of the mail-order house, but there is really nothing to prevent him from being local agent for the manufacturers or jobbers of hardware, refrigerators, clothing, etc., and thus be well equipped with catalogs that will enable him to make sales of specialties that he does not carry in stock. The mail-order house sells by catalog; why not the retailer? Of course, if the retailer is safe in carrying a stock of the goods, his chance of selling will be greatly improved.

If the retailer will handle a number of lines of goods that are well advertised by the manufacturers, mention of these goods in his advertising will enable him to derive some benefit from the general advertising. Suppose, for example, he handles Edison Phonographs, Keen Kutter Tools, Kuppenheimer Clothing, Heinz's 57 Varieties, or has the exclusive agency for a well-known brand of hats or an excellent coffee. The aggressive advertising done by the manufacturers of those articles is sure to help his own advertising.

If the sales of the retailer are large enough, he can have some classes of goods made up with his own name, or mark, on them. Progressive manufacturers stand ready to help the retailer, and the retailer, by applying, can often get first-class window cards, electrotypes of good advertisements, first-class cuts for illustrations, etc.

The local retailer can offer to fill orders by mail where customers do not find it convenient to come to town. He can send out samples of dress goods, etc., and can pay freight charges on purchases of good size. He can make many sales by means of good letters.

Compare These Prices With Catalog-House Prices

WE recognize the right of every one to buy where he pleases. We have no quarrel with folks that ask us to buy their produce, and then when they want to buy something send their money 500 miles away to catalog houses. It's true, though, that none of that money ever comes back to Orange County to make better schools and roads and to add to the general development.

But waive acquaintance and sentiment aside. Look at the question as a matter of self-interest. We have the catalogs of the mail-order houses and know their prices. Look here:

9. Bargain Sales.—The retailer cannot learn too well the lesson of having bargain sales and getting off his hands goods that will soon be out of season, nor can he overestimate the value of an occasional offering of some unusual bargain—a desirable, up-to-date article at cost or less.

Fig. 7 affords a suggestion for an advertisement designed to turn customers away from the “catalog habit.” This is only one of many good advertisements that could be written. This firm has probably cut the price to cost on the three articles mentioned in the advertisement, but it is not likely to make a great many sales at these prices and can thus easily afford the cut. Of course, an advertisement of this kind is advisable only in cases where it becomes necessary to “take the bull by the horns” and adopt a radical remedy.

BUILDING UP INDIVIDUALITY

10. The public impression of a store depends to some extent on the advertising. If the advertising is truthful, is full of good store news, emphasizes quality, is displayed with appropriate types and borders, and is properly supported, the store will in time surely become recognized as a high-grade store. If the advertising is exaggerative, is full of glittering generalities rather than real information about goods, and gives notice of “closing-out” sales every month, the store must content itself with a rather low class of trade and a shifting patronage.

It is for the advertiser and his ad-writer to decide what impression shall be made on the public, whether the line of attack shall be low price or high quality, whether great care shall be used to cultivate and retain public confidence, or whether claims and sales shall be made regardless of the truth of the statements.

Every store has something about its policy or its service that can be exploited continually to help build up a priceless public impression. A drug store may have a system of double-checking all prescriptions as a means of insuring accuracy. Clothing stores may have superior facilities for changing and fitting suits. A grocer may have a distinctive delivery service. A plumbing-and-heating firm may do all work under a guarantee. A bakery may be scrupulously clean. The proprietor of an ice-cream business may use artesian water of high quality in all his work. Such features interest the public and make lasting impressions.

EXAMPLES OF RETAIL ADVERTISING

11. In order to advertise a retail business successfully, it is necessary to study that business exhaustively, so as to discover what there is in the service or merchandise that will make a favorable impression on prospective customers, and then to set forth these selling points in the most effective way and by the most economical plan. This fundamental principle is the same whether the business to be promoted is a bakery or a fish market, a shoe store or a harness shop. Each business, of course, has some details that are peculiar to itself, and in each the ad-writer determines the best line of attack on public favor only after a careful study of both the business and the class of people it aims to serve.

The examples of retail advertising in this and a following Section are intended merely as demonstrations, and from the preceding remarks, the reason for not giving examples of all the various lines of retail advertising will be apparent. A careful study of the examples will give such an understanding of the principles that the ad-writer can go to work intelligently when called on to promote any retail business.

Not even in these few examples can inflexible rules be laid down as to the exact plans to be followed, the amount of money to be spent, the kind of mediums to be used, the size of the advertisements, the frequency of insertion, etc. These details can be determined only after careful study of each individual retailer's problem, and often some details can be settled only by a test of different methods. The plan that would be judicious for a furniture store that had practically no competition in a city of 25,000 inhabitants thoroughly covered by one good newspaper might be a poor plan for another furniture dealer in a city of 375,000 that supported a number of good newspapers and aggressive furniture stores. If all retailers of a certain class in one city followed just the same plan, the sameness would hinder successful advertising. There should be an individuality to each advertiser's work. Advertising science has not yet become so nearly exact that one may say, before thoroughly studying the business to be promoted, just what should be done to make the advertising campaign successful. The advertising man does well to profit as much as possible by the knowledge and experience of others, but he cannot rely on cut-and-dried plans, nor always be safe in following the ideas of others.

CLOTHING AND DRY GOODS

12. Advertising of Clothing.—Retail clothiers advertise more extensively than any other class of merchants selling a single line of goods. Everybody must wear clothes, and would have to buy them whether the dealers advertised or not. But advertising enables the clothier to meet competition, to force the sale of new styles of clothing, and to sell more clothes than if he did not advertise. Advertising not only controls trade, but actually creates it. Many people do not realize what they need until some one tells them. A desire for beautiful or convenient things—luxuries, not necessities—may be created in the minds of all persons. This is especially true of clothing. When the average man buys a suit of clothes, he believes that he will wear it at least two seasons, and a woman usually thinks the same thing about a jacket. But if the style changes at the end of the first season, the man must buy a new suit if he wants to be well dressed. Short coats may be popular one season; long coats, the next; and so on. Women's jackets, cloaks, suits, etc. are subject to even more change than that which takes place in men's clothing, and women are, as a rule, more particular about having their clothes just in style. Dealers in wearing apparel welcome a change in styles, because it means increased business—that is, if the people are made aware, through advertising, that their present clothes are out of style and that they can find the proper thing at the clothier's store.

Style, particularly at the beginning of a season, is a much more important factor of clothing advertising than it is often supposed to be. Women are keenly interested in new styles, and men like to know about the fall shapes in derbies, the length and cut of new coats, etc. There should be much style talk in the early part of the season. Price is nearly always important, but it may be emphasized to better advantage in the middle or latter part of the season. The writer of clothing advertisements should keep well informed as to styles. This he can easily do through the clothing-trade journals.

13. The chief selling points of ready-made clothing are style, fit, quality, and price. The custom tailor's strong points are style, fit, and quality. He cannot meet the low price of ready-made clothing, so his advertisements should point out why his clothes are worth the higher price. Some tailors of the middle grade approach ready-made prices closely and have a good argument; they can give individuality, and a good fit at just a little more than the price of a ready-made suit. The retailer, on the other hand, should advertise how nearly he can approximate the tailor's style, fit, and quality for a lower price. Owing to the great improvements that have been made in ready-to-wear clothing, the custom tailor is now entirely dependent on two classes of customers: first, those who are able and willing to pay his prices in order that they may wear clothes of distinctive pattern and material, and suited to their individual notions of what good clothing should be; and, second, those who are so oddly proportioned that they cannot be fitted in the ordinary clothing store. Even the latter class of the tailor's customers is being rapidly thinned out, owing to the introduction of slim, stout, long, and short variations of the normal sizes. Then, again, high-grade, ready-to-wear clothing is so built up by padding and so shaped with stiff linings that abnormal proportions and defective builds are concealed, and the wearer is made to look like a normally proportioned individual. In view of these facts, price is the chief selling point of ready-made clothing. Next in importance are style, fit, and wear.

14. Clothing advertisements must necessarily be seasonable, and should occasionally be enlivened with first-class illustrations of models wearing the particular clothes advertised. Stipple or half-shaded line cuts are the best for the purpose, though coarse half-tones are sometimes more representative of the particular style of clothing. If the ad-writer cannot get ready-made cuts that correctly represent the goods, he should procure a photograph of them on a good-looking model, and send it to some first-class engraving house for reproduction. Special cuts are somewhat expensive, but they add so much to the appearance and effectiveness of the advertisement that it pays to use them. The drawings can be copyrighted in the clothier's name, and the copyright notice, appearing under the illustration, will convince the reader that it is an accurate picture of the article advertised. In general, it is best not to advertise more than one kind of clothing in an advertisement, except when announcing a special sale. In such a case, the real selling point is "the reduced prices due to the prolonged warm weather," or "the damage done by water or smoke," "the necessity of clearing out the old stock to make room for new goods," etc. All these apply to the stock in general rather than to any particular class of clothing.

15. Examples of Clothing Advertisements.—In Fig. 8 is shown a good example of an advertisement for popular-priced, ready-made clothing. The illustration shows the style of these $15 worsted suits, and the price, being a strong selling point, is brought out in the heading. This advertisement, while not crowded, is well filled with good argument and description.

16. In Fig. 9 is shown a good example of an advertisement for an overcoat sale. The illustration in this advertisement has much attention-attracting power, and the descriptive items are well written. An advertisement of this character could hardly fail to attract every reader of a paper that had any idea of buying an overcoat. This advertisement in its original form measured 10 inches across 5 columns. It is shown reduced in Fig. 9.

17. Fig. 10 shows how a clothing store may exploit boys' suits in a special advertisement. It is also a good example of the bargain advertisement; notice the reason given for the low price.

18. In Fig. 11 is shown an advertisement that is good in many respects. It is important in an advertisement of women's suits, cloaks, etc. to illustrate the particular style offered by the store, because women pay much closer attention to the style of the garment than do men. The illustration in Fig. 11 was drawn especially for this advertisement and is consistent with the description.

19. Some high-priced tailors make it a rule never to mention prices, but the makers of medium-priced and low-priced suits do well to give prices in their advertisements. While it may be argued that price is a point that had better be left to the salesman, it should be remembered that many men do not like to go into a store and then admit that they cannot afford to pay the price asked. As a general rule, it is better to give prices in both advertisements and window cards.

In Fig. 12 is shown a strong advertisement for blue serge suits. The strength of the advertisement is largely due to its concentration on the blue-serge suiting.

In Fig. 13 is shown an example of the personal, "face-to-face" style that can be adopted by some tailors to advantage. A tailor that feels it is best not to exploit prices, may make his appeal to the public in advertisements of the style shown in Fig. 14.

20. Millinery and Waist Advertisements.—The advertisements reproduced in Figs. 15, 16, and 17 explain are more popular this season than ever before.

There's scarcely a day that some wearer of ready-mades doesn't come in and wonder how he could ever have worn ready-made clothing when he can get for $20 such material, workmanship, and fit as I give.

The fact is, I have the finest line of $20 suitings in the city; and I am as careful of each customer as if he were the only one I had.

I want you to see my suitings. Just received a new lot last week. There are a number of handsome gray and brown worsteds in this lot; fine serges, too. You won't be urged to buy, but if you give me an order you're sure to get a well-made suit with an individuality—one that will do good service for two seasons. Most good tailors would charge $25 or $30 for a suit like my $20 grade. If I didn't have a big list of patrons, I'd have to charge $5 or $10 more.

The Cut of the Coat

TELLS the taste of the tailor. The garment that strikes your fancy may not be the one that you should wear. In the mirror of the retail clothier you cannot see yourself as others see you. Is it safe to trust your appearance to the judgment of the ready-made salesman—biased by the necessity of fitting you to the clothing rather than the clothing to you? Individuality and character are subtly expressed in every garment I make. Years of experience in serving the best dressers guarantee that clothing made by me is perfect in style and finish, and is of the color and cut best suited to the wearer's complexion and figure.

themselves. Note the "newsy" feature. Each advertisement gives some information about a particular class of goods that is sure to be interesting to prospective purchasers. It cannot be too strongly emphasized or repeated too often that this is the kind of advertising that brings customers. In Fig. 15, the prices are properly left undisplayed. Both the illustration and the border of the advertisement shown in Fig. 17 were drawn. This made the advertisement more expensive, but the cut could probably be used more than once, and it is very distinctive.

21. Advertising of Dry Goods.—Dry-goods stores in the larger cities cannot, as a rule, meet the low prices of the department stores, but they can easily attract and hold a desirable class of customers by carrying better or more complete stocks than their price-cutting competitors. Price is a very strong selling point, but it is not everything. The tendency among department stores is to carry cheap, quick-selling goods, but the steady demand for better and higher-priced products makes the opportunity and should shape the business and advertising policy of the independent dealer. He should so advertise and conduct his business that whenever the women of the locality want good merchandise or their choice of a large variety, they will come to him just as quickly as they would go to the department store for bargains in cheap materials or ordinary articles. While the independent dealer cannot continuously imitate the bargain-counter methods of the department store, his occasional cut-price sales of high-grade goods will attract a most desirable class of new customers and hold the old.

22. The advertisements of the independent dealer should tell of the quality of his stock, the variety of patterns or shapes or sizes, and then point out that at the prices quoted he is offering values that are real bargains, because they are bargains in high-grade goods, the prices of which are not ordinarily cut. If he has the sole agency for a corset, for a line of silks, for gloves, or for stockings, or makes a specialty of such goods, it is a good idea to run special advertisements of them, pointing out that they are of superior quality and not obtainable elsewhere. He should also watch the magazines to see which articles that he carries are being advertised by the makers. By advertising that he sells these goods, he will reap direct benefit from the magazine advertising.

Dry-goods advertisements should be descriptive, should tell all the good points of an article, and should suggest its use or desirability. Conciseness and brevity are good qualities in advertisements, but it is poor policy to save space at the expense of clearness. Women are the buyers of dry goods, and they will read anything that conveys real information about goods that interest them.

23. Probably no branch of advertising furnishes more examples of weak writing than that relating to dry goods. The ad-writer that can paint a word picture of an article or its use is the one that will create business. If he can do it in a few words, he is a genius; but if he cannot, he had better stick to full descriptions in every-day language. Many ad-writers, in attempting to write from a feminine standpoint, make themselves ridiculous by descriptions in high-flown and altogether unnatural language. Other ad-writers try to cover their lack of knowledge by "smart phrases," alliteration, circus-poster superlatives, and infantile chatter. There is no excuse for such waste of space. No ad-writer is expected to know all the technical excellencies of the numberless materials and articles sold in dry-goods stores, but he can find out enough points to write effective advertisements. Some dry-goods merchants and retail salesmen are well informed on such matters. The salesmen sent out by jobbers have to know these points, and the ad-writer should try to meet and question these men. They want their special lines pushed, and will gladly cooperate in the production of advertisements that will sell their goods.

24. It is a good idea for the ad-writer to read his copy to some woman of common sense, and notice whether or not it conveys the desired information. Often, in thus reading his work, he will discover weaknesses in his style that he had not noticed in writing the copy. Too often, writers of advertising strive to write something that they think will please other advertising men or the advertising journals, rather than something that may be easily understood and appreciated by women. An advertisement should contain just about what a salesman would say in personally offering the article for sale to a customer. It need not necessarily be conversational in style, but it should be written in the language of the people.

25. Illustrations should be used as freely as possible. Cuts from illustrating syndicates are all right if they are up to date and have some connection with the article advertised. Specially prepared illustrations, however, are very desirable and effective. These may be drawn to agree with the fashion plates that are printed in women's magazines and in the illustrated Sunday papers. A reputation for using cuts that represent the latest styles is a valuable asset to any dry-goods merchant. Women are always interested in styles and will hunt through the paper to find a picture of a well-dressed woman.

26. Size of Dry-Goods Advertisements.—Dry-goods advertising should be continuous, but heavier in the best selling seasons. The amount of space to be used depends principally on the size of the store or the amount of business required.

The ad-writer should keep close watch of the sales made and the class of customers drawn to the store by his advertisements. If he finds he is appealing to the wrong class of people, he should change the advertisements to a style and character that will appeal to a more desirable class. If some clerks are kept too busy and others are idle, he should reduce the advertising of the busy department and push the weaker one, taking into account, of course, their relative importance.

It is a waste of space to lay out a small advertisement on the plan of a page department-store advertisement, yet many small advertisers attempt to do so. There is some difference of opinion about the best location of the firm name in a page advertisement, but in small advertisements it should always appear at the bottom. It will then be possible to display the article advertised effectively, without giving the advertisement a top-heavy appearance. If the space used is less than one-eighth page, it is better, as a rule, to devote this space to one article or to one special line of goods. It is more profitable to make a strong presentation of one leader than to break up small space into insignificant panels. Strong display in small space gives an impression of strength; ineffectual imitation of big advertisements is a confession of weakness. Of course, in selecting specialties to be advertised, goods should be chosen that are either in themselves worth advertising or that will bring customers who will buy other goods on which a profit will be made. Beginners often make the mistake of selecting insignificant articles that accomplish neither of the objects named. It sometimes happens, however, that a number of small lots of goods can be assembled in a bargain advertisement that will prove both attractive and profitable. If small space is used, it is a good idea to specify that the advertisement shall be placed continuously on the same page and in the same position. A special face of display type and a special border will also help to make the advertisement prominent and will assist regular readers in finding it.

27. Examples of Dry-Goods Advertisements.—In Figs. 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 are shown examples of dry-goods advertisements that bring out the principles set forth in the preceding paragraphs. The advertisement shown in Fig. 18 is printed from a mortised cut. This kind of advertising is much more expensive than plain type advertising, for the services of both illustrator and engraver are required. The advertisement shown in Fig. 19 has nothing of cleverness or uniqueness about it, but it is an effective advertisement. Fig. 20 shows what a strong, clear display DeVinne makes. Fig. 21 is an example of unusually well-written copy.

The NEMO Solves the Corset Problem

Our store is Hartford headquarters for the famous NEMO Corset—the corset that's made in so many different models and sizes that it is no trouble whatever for our experienced fitter to give a woman just what she needs to make her figure look best.

Nemo Military Belt—Another wonderfully popular Nemo specialty; for medium figures; gives the small, in-curve waist, so fashionable, you know. Price—$3. See sketch on the left.

Nemo Self-Reducing Corset—The most satisfactory Stout Woman's Corset; the Corset that positively reduces the stout woman's figure—gives her style and grace—and at the same time gives her comfort and health. We have models for both tall and short stout figures. A full range of sizes. Prices—$3 and $5. See sketch on the right.

Nemo Swan-Shaped Corsets—These are the Nemos, par excellence, for medium and slender figures. They give beautiful curves of swan-like grace; fittingly named "Swan shape"—$2 to $3.50.

Nemo Fastoon—For medium and slender figures; embroidered in festoon design at top and bottom and winsome little dots scattered between. The Corset for fine and dainty lingerie models—$2 to $3.50.

There's a Nemo made for every figure—and made to improve the figure of the slender as well as of the stout woman.

Bear in mind—that Nemo Corsets are as famous for wear as for style—strength and durability combined with Parisian chic and grace. Let us fit you with a Nemo—the Nemo that's meant for you. Fittings free of charge.

“Should My Daughter Wear Corsets?”

This is a question many a mother asks herself when she sees her well-developed daughter of 15 or 16 years.

Several years ago we thought out the problem and prepared Girdles and Corsets at regular stepping-stone intervals to suit the needs of school girls and young women from 12 to 16 or 17 years.

These Girdles at 50c are the tiniest waist protection possible, preventing the waistbands cutting into the flesh.

Next comes a little longer girdle—for the large girl. Then a Corset with smallest hip and bust proportions to prevent the figure spreading. Prices range to $2.

Beautiful New Cottons

There must be a new rainbow within the vision of Fashion—so wondrously beautiful are the colors of these new cottons. The clever loom artists seem to weave cloud colors into a silk and cotton fabric and then strew it with flowers. They call it Cotton Voile.

That's one of the new cottons.

"Beautiful beyond expectation" you will say when you see. On plain grounds of white and mauve are skilfully printed the loveliest sprays of summer flowers. Some of the blooms fairly stand in relief—hand-painted, as it were. Others are embroidered over the printings in conventional designs. Twenty-eight cents is the lowest price for these loom triumphs—forty cents is the largest, but there's much choosing in between.

Another thing of beauty is the Mercerized Mull.

Soft finished in delicate shades of mauve, salmon, sky, cream and white that fairly glisten like snow under sunlight. Most elaborate summer blouses and dresses will be made from these dainty fabrics. Just fancy the little price—

GLOSSARY OF DRY-GOODS TERMS

28. The following glossary of dry-goods terms (originally published in the Dry-Goods Economist) will prove serviceable to writers that intend to make a specialty of dry-goods advertising. It should not be inferred, however, that it is advisable to use uncommon technical terms in advertisements without giving their meanings. To make the greatest success of dry-goods advertising, the writer himself must understand the technical differences of various kinds of cloth, etc., and this list of definitions should prove useful in attempting to gain such knowledge. The common terms—those which the average purchaser will readily understand—may of course be used freely in advertising copy.

This glossary of dry-goods terms is suggestive of the fact that a knowledge of the technical differences of material and construction is important in any line of advertising work that the ad-writer may select. The ad-writer that does not learn the difference between cast iron, wrought iron, steel, etc., cannot make the greatest success of hardware advertising. Neither can a writer do the most effective furniture advertising if he remains ignorant of different woods, methods of joining, furniture history, styles, finishes, etc.

Algret.—A stiff plume. Sometimes erroneously applied to “egret,” a term used to describe light, floating feathers.

Allover.—Embroideries or lace materials in which the design or pattern extends over the entire surface of the fabric in contradistinction to edges and insertions.

Appliqué.—Materials cut out and sewed, embroidered, or pasted on other materials.

Armure.—A chain weave in which the threads are thrown in repeating small pebbled designs such as minute diamonds or other angled figures. Used in silks and dress goods.

Bandeau.—A band or part of a band placed in the head-size of a hat to raise part or the whole of it.

Barré.—Materials having stripes or bars running across the cloth produced by various processes of weaving or printing.

Basket Weave.—A style of weave in which the plaited work of a basket is reproduced by the pattern. Linen basket cloth is a variety of crash suiting.

Batiste.—A fine cotton muslin having a great deal of dressing, resembling lawn, the difference being that batiste is slightly heavier.

Bedford Cord.—A weave used in dress goods similar to cotton piqué, consisting of heavy ribs running lengthwise in the fabric.

Beige.—Dress fabrics of smooth texture produced by using yarn in which the colors are mixed.

Bengaline.—A plain, round, corded weave of silk and wool in which the wool is used as a filling covered by the silk; smooth in surface, small in grain.

Botany Yarn.—Yarn composed of a fine grade of Australian wool and used in the manufacture of worsted dress goods.

Bouclé.—Knotted and curled effects raised upon the surface of the cloth produced by the use of two-ply yarn in which one thread is wound around the other and partly drawn out so as to produce a loop. Rarely used in silk fabrics.

Bouillonné.—Narrow shirrings of chiffon that edge wide ruffles or plaitings of the same or other materials.

Bourette.—An effect produced by introducing lumpy, knotted yarn in the weaving. The yarn so introduced is woven in at intervals, forming patterns or creating an evenly arranged rough surface.

Box Plait.—A double fold, or plait, formed by the folding of the cloth alternately in opposite directions so as to form a kind of plait from each side.

Brandenburg.—A military ornament of braid and loops with which a jacket is fastened.

Broché.—An effect where the warp design is raised in floats and appears as if embossed on the surface of the fabric.

Brodé.—Embroidered effects either on silks, woolens, or cottons.

Butcher's Linen.—A plain weave fabric of linen used for dress purposes; similar to crash in appearance, but lighter in weight and composed of smoother yarns.

Camel's Hair.—A loosely woven woolen fabric in which a very long fiber is employed. It is composed of the finest worsted.

Cashmere.—A wool fabric twilled on one side only, with soft finish.

Challie.—An extremely light-weight dress fabric, cotton or wool, woven without twill, free from dressing.

Cheesecloth.—Thin muslin, bleached or brown, free from sizing.

Cheviot.—Twilled, nappy woolen cloth.

Chiffon.—A transparent, fine-woven silk gauze.

Chiné.—Fabrics in which the pattern is printed on the warp, so that when woven the crossing threads show the design in a broken effect, giving the appearance of shadows, etc.

Corduroy.—A heavy, ribbed cotton material made like velvet, with a twilled foundation and a pile surface.

Couteau.—A knife-like twill or wing.

Covert.—A twilled diagonal cloth usually made in mixtures for tailoring.

Craquelé.—Crackled- or broken-glass effect in lace, net, or silk.

Crêpe de Chine.—A crinkled, thin, silk dress fabric.

Crêpe Lisse.—A zephyr gauze of silk plain woven.

Crepon.—A crinkled dress fabric made of silk or wool, or mixed. Also cotton.

Croisé.—A cross twill in weaving. Applied to velvets, means twilled back instead of the old straight back.

Crystal.—A heavy corded silk with wool filling, in which the small cords alternate with large, regular or irregular cords.

Damask.—In weaving, a name long used to designate a particular style of twill, and specifically applied to several kinds of twill-woven fabrics. At the present day, damask in its broadest application denotes a twilled linen or silken texture richly figured in the loom with patterns of a large and dignified type, as flowers, leaves, fruit, and ornamental scrolls. Damask, being a matter of weave rather than of any particular fiber, may be produced in various materials; linen, silk, and bright wools, however, being the most effective.—Cole's Encyclopedia of Dry Goods.

Damassé.—Fabrics ornamented on the surface with a rich design, the running figure woven, but not printed—same as damask.

Dimity.—Thin white goods, plain or printed, distinguished by raised threads or cords running lengthwise.

Directoire.—In the style of the French Directory, 1793–1801.

Drap d'été.—A worsted material made like cashmere.

Dresden.—A very small unobtrusive design. The term has been adopted from Dresden china, to designate small, neat effects in printing.

Duchesse.—A satin fabric of which the back is woven in flat twills, making a smooth face, not showing the twilled effect.

Egret.—Light floating feathers obtained from the heron.

Empire.—Styles of women's dress fashionable during the reign of Napoleon I, based on the mode of dress customary in ancient Greece.

Eolienne.—A sheer silk and wool fabric.

Etamine.—A canvas weave with a wide mesh, rendering it more or less transparent; sometimes woven with a silk stripe.

Façoné.—Figured goods in which the design is raised upon the surface. Silk or wool.

Fagoting.—A crisscross openwork stitch done in a rope silk.

Faille.—Soft-ribbed dress silk with a prominent cord extending across the fabric. Not so heavy as Ottoman; twice as large as grosgrain.

Feston.—Loop designs, sometimes called scallops.

Flitter.—Spangles made of composition, light in weight.

Floconné.—A silk dress material having small flakes of white or color.

Foulard.—A soft, thin, washable dress silk woven without twill. Twilled foulard, so known, is really a silk serge.

Fourragère.—Ornaments of braid set on each side of a bodice, and connected by one or more long, drooping cords.

Galloon.—Narrow trimming of wool, silk, tinsel, cotton, etc. Also gilt or silver lace on uniforms, liveries, and band caps.

Glacé.—Changeable colors, usually in silk or woollen goods, produced in weaving. Glacé gloves are those finished with a polished or dressed surface.

Granité.—A weave in which the yarns are twisted to a sufficient extent to give a sort of roughened surface.

Grenadine.—An openwork transparent material of silk, wool, or cotton.

Grosgrain.—A stout, close-woven, fine-corded or grained dress silk, dyed in plain colors and having but little luster. It has long been a staple among dress silks, and on account of its superior wearing qualities has been generally held in high estimation.—Cole's Encyclopedia of Dry Goods.

Guimpe.—A front and back yoke to be worn with low-cut dress, with or without sleeves.

Habutaye.—A plain-woven silk made in Japan on hand looms. Smooth and even in texture.

Illusion.—A thin and very transparent tulle (see tulle).

Incise.—An effect produced by cutting out designs in a dress material and placing silk or some other fabric underneath it, the edges of the upper material being sewed down.

Jaconet.—A fine muslin, heavier than cambric, free from starch or dressing, but glazed by calendering.

Jacquard.—Applied to materials woven on Jacquard looms, which automatically select the threads and make the designs formerly produced on hand looms only.

Jardinière.—In flower-garden designs.

Jupon.—A short petticoat. Applied to the new double and triple skirts. The upper skirt is the jupon.

Khaki.—A Japanese silk, plain woven and less fine in weave than the habutaye.

Lansdowne.—A silk-and-wool material of very light construction.

Liberty.—Thin, satin-finished silk.

Louisine.—A silk fabric of overlapping weave producing an uneven surface, which resembles that of an armure in miniature.

Luxor.—A ribbed satin or silk cloth, soft and rich.

Maline.—A very fine silk net of gauzelike texture.

Matelassé.—Woolen or silk cloth that has a raised pattern on the surface as if quilted or wadded.

Medallion.—An ornament of lace that is applied to a garment.

Medici.—A collar for cloaks and dresses, very high and stiffened, rolling outwards at the top.

Mélange.—Mixtures of color applied in weaving. Also mixtures of cotton warp and wool weft.

Melton.—Stout, smooth, woolen cloth used for men's clothing and ladies' coats. The nap is sheared close to the surface and is finished without pressing or glossing.

Mercerize.—A chemical process of rendering cotton threads lustrous. The thread is shortened and hardened, producing a silky effect.

Merveilleux.—A class of fine-twilled, satin-faced silk.

Messaline.—A light-weight silk having a lustrous surface and soft, sheer weave.

Miroir.—Glossy or brilliant surface produced on pile and silk fabrics by calendering.

Mohair.—A light-weight fabric having a lustrous surface composed of the wool obtained from the Angora goat.

Moiré.—A watered effect produced on silks.

Moiré Velours.—A silk fabric with a twilled face, on which a watered effect has been produced.

Moreen.—Fabric of mohair or wool filling and cotton warp. Made in imitation of moiré silk.

Motif.—The unit of a design that is repeated over and over again in a lace pattern. Frequently the motif is taken out and used separately, in which case it approximates closely to a medallion.

Mousseline de Sole.—An extremely fine, soft muslin made of silk.

Ombré.—A graduated stripe embodying colorings, shading from light to dark or vice versa.

Oxford.—Originally a wool fabric in dark-gray and white mixtures (90 per cent. of the former and 10 per cent. of the latter). Of late, heavy cotton and linen fabrics have been known by this name.

Paillette.—A spangle or scale. Also applied to large round spots or patterns on fabrics.

Paletot.—A loose outer coat, the distinguishing feature of which is the length of the skirt, this extending 10 inches or more below the waistline.

Panne.—A pile fabric of the satin antique variety. Long-haired, but not very lustrous.

Passementerie.—Heavy embroideries or edgings and galloons, especially those made of rich gimps, braids, beads, silks, and tinsel.

Pastel Shades.—Very light tints somewhat opaque.

Pastille.—A round or oval spot; also applied to trimmings that are in lozenge design.

Peau de Cygne.—One of the popular weaves of soft, highly finished silk, closely resembling peau de soie.

Peau de Sole.—Silk woven like grosgrain, but with a rib so fine as to produce a plain-woven face. The best grades are finished alike on both sides. The effect is satiny.

Pelerine.—A small cape. A term now specially applied to a form of ladies' neckwear.

Percalé.—A kind of cambric closely and firmly woven, with more dressing than ordinary muslin; printed or plain.

Picot.—Small loop used as an ornamental edging on ribbons or lace.

Plastron.—Part of the garment covering the breast.

Pointillé.—Dotted with small spots or polka dots.

Pompadour.—Small flowered designs printed or brocaded in bright colors.

Pongee.—Thin, soft-silk fabric woven from the natural uncolored raw silk.

Pongee Imperial.—Heavy pongee with taffeta surface.

Popeline.—A repped wool and silk material, the warp of silk.

Postillon.—Two ends or tabs at the back of a jacket or waist.

Princess.—A long gown made in one continuous piece fitting closely.

Radium.—A term signifying a brilliant finish; applied to silk and braids.

Rayé.—Striped.

Rep.—Style of weaving in which the surface has a cross-wise ribbed appearance as a distinction from “cords,” which extend lengthwise in the fabric.

Shantung.—A heavy grade of pongee silk in which the natural color of the material is preserved.

Sheath Gown.—A gown of Parisian origin that created a sensation in 1908. It is a modification of an early style used by Directoire dressmakers. Its distinguishing feature is the snugness with which it fits the figure, this being so extreme that a slit from the hem to the knee is provided to give freedom for walking.

Sicilienne.—A mohair of heavy weight, either plain or with a fancy pattern.

Suède.—Leather finished on the wrong, or flesh, side, or having the thin, glossy outergrain shaved or peeled off, leaving an undressed surface.

Surah. A light, soft, twilled silk.

Teneriffe.—A lace stitch; a form of drawnwork in which the wheel pattern predominates.

Tulle.—Plain, fine silk nets.

Tussah.—The wild silk produced by silkworms that feed on oak leaves and the fabric made therefrom.

Venetian.—An all-wool material of a broadcloth construction, except that the face is twilled.

Volle, or Velling.—A fabric similar to the old-fashioned nun’s veiling, but made with somewhat heavier yarns.

Zibeline.—The French word for sable; also applied to a dress material that to a greater or less extent imitates fur.

RETAIL MANAGEMENT

(PART 3)

HARDWARE

1. In beginning to advertise a hardware store, the advertising man need not become bewildered by the great variety of tools and implements. He should concentrate his energies on the specialties that will bring the people to the store. The salesmen are expected to see that customers buy everything that they need before they go, and to treat them so well that they will come again and continuously patronize the store. Of course, as in other lines of retail advertising, the specialties selected should be those that can be profitably advertised. For example, it would not pay to insert a special advertisement to sell a lot of a dozen 50-cent pocket knives.

The following examples of the advertising of hardware specialties show the possibilities.

2. Ice-Cream Freezers.—Suppose that it is the month of June. Nothing could be more seasonable than ice-cream freezers, but perhaps there are different styles and various sizes in stock. Will it be better to advertise a cheap freezer or one more expensive? That depends on the class of people that live in the locality, the margin of profit on the different styles, or the firm's desire to push any particular make. Probably the cheapest freezer is kept in stock and sold at a small profit merely to meet competition; the firm is not desirous of pushing it, because it fails to satisfy the customer. Then, again, most persons that can afford to make ice cream are able to pay for the better grade of freezer. Such persons are also more likely to become good customers of the store. So, everything considered, the high-priced freezer is the best one to advertise.

Get an Easier Freezer

Don't waste time and temper on an old-fashioned, hard-running machine. A child can freeze cream in ten minutes with the ARCTIC. Saves ice. Will outwear two cheaper freezers. Made of best Virginia white cedar; electric-welded wire hoops that can't work loose; triple action. Come and see one. Gallon size, $2.50; 2-quart size, $1.75.

The things to be considered then are: Why is this freezer the best, and what can be said about freezers that will not only induce people to buy freezers, but to buy this high-priced freezer? An examination of the maker's catalog and of the freezer itself will develop strong points for a good series of freezer advertisements. Figs. 1 and 2 show two advertisements that would be appropriate. Note that in each case one strong selling point is brought out in the heading.

3. Lawn Mowers.—Every householder that rents or owns a plot of grass needs a lawn mower. To the inexperienced buyer, all mowers look alike. In fact, the low-priced, low-grade mower is frequently painted and finished just as attractively as the well-made article. The poorest grade of mowers is usually offered by department and novelty stores, where bargain prices are too often the only consideration in making sales. What the hardware dealer requires, then,

Ice Cream in 10 Minutes

Turn the crank of the ARCTIC ten minutes and it's done. The ARCTIC costs a little more than some others, but it runs easier, lasts longer, and freezes better than a cheaper machine. Gearing completely covered; no ice or salt can get into it to clog the vent; fingers can't get caught. Tub of high-white cedar. Strong, heavy can, covered with black tin. Gallon size, $2.50; 2-gallon size, $4.

is an advertisement pointing out the superiority of some standard make of mower over the cheap goods of his price-cutting competitors. Lawn-mower manufacturers do not issue many catalogs for distribution to prospective customers, but any well-informed salesman will explain the difference between a cheaply made and a well-made mower. The low-priced mower has, as a rule, only three blades (the revolving cutter knives); the better grades have from four to six blades. The greater number of blades insures cleaner cutting and easier action. Each blade has less work to do, and therefore does it better. The low-priced mower has a narrow wheel base (the distance between the centers of the front wheel and the rear roller), and is inclined to bob up and down over every weed or ant hill on the lawn. The better-grade mower has a wide wheel base and tends to level all irregularities of the ground. The low-priced mower quickly becomes dull because of the poor material of which the blades are made, and the owner must continually be paying for resharpening them. The better-grade mower has finely tempered blades that stay sharp for a long time, thus saving expense and annoyance. The low-priced mower has few and inaccurate adjustments. In fact, after being used a short time it is almost impossible to take up the wear, and the machine becomes useless. The better-grade machine can quickly be adjusted to cut high or low or to take up wear, and will run well after 5 years' use.

4. Fig. 3 shows an example of a mower advertisement that brings out some good points, both as to the desirability of a mower and as to the superior features of the "Smooth-Kut" mower.

5. Gas Stoves.—The increasing use of electric lights as a substitute for gas has caused gas manufacturers to encourage the introduction of gas stoves. In many cities they make arrangements with hardware dealers or gas companies to sell gas stoves and heaters at very low figures and to set them up free of charge. The gas stove offers some very strong selling points. Gas-stove cooking is quicker, cooler, and more economical than coal-range cooking. A perusal of the maker's catalog or a talk with a salesman or user of a gas stove will furnish the ad-writer with material for several good advertisements. The one shown in Fig. 4 contains an illustration that emphasizes the ease with which cooking may be done with gas.

6. These examples of advertisements of hardware specialties are by no means the strongest that could be written for ice-cream freezers, lawn mowers, and gas ranges, but are shown as suggestive examples.

7. Special Sales.—There is no reason why the hardware store may not occasionally have special sales of certain lines of goods. These special sales, in addition to clearing out stock, will be the means of gaining new customers for the store and will give the store a chance to show customers

An unkempt grass plot looks like a man that needs a shave, but a smooth lawn greatly improves the appearance of any dwelling.

If your lawn needs a shave, a four-blade, Smooth-Kut Mower will trim the grass, level the humps, and fill up the hollows.

It will stay sharp, push easier, cut smoother, and wear longer than any lower-priced make. Price, $5.50. Come and see one. We have cheaper makes if you prefer them; prices, $2.75 and $3.75.

Supper Quickly ing Your Gown

IT'S easy if you own a Regal gas stove. You can't appreciate the saving in time, temper, and money effected by a Regal gas stove until you have used one. It is as great an improvement on a coal stove as the latter is on the old-fashioned fireplace. The Regal is the secret of happy housekeeping. At the touch of a match, it gives an intense heat just where you want it—instantly controllable. No smoke, no smell, no coal to bring up, no ashes to carry out. No fallen cakes, burnt bread, nor delayed meals. Quick, reliable, and economical. All the Regals have large baking ovens with the heat scientifically distributed. They make baking and roasting a real pleasure. Every Regal is guaranteed for three years. Set up in your kitchen, attached, and ready for use, without extra charge. Prices, $7.50 to $35.

Down Go Prices On Window & Door Screens

THE chilly raw winds have compelled people to keep the windows closed and to stay indoors, and the frisky mosquito has not had the courage to come out and tell us that this is "the good old Summer time," and that he is ready for business at the old stand.

Result—Screens have not moved so rapidly as we had a right to expect.

Second result—prices are lowered to force the selling.

You'll need screens in due time—make no mistake about that. Summer will come and so will the mosquitoes. Be wise and fortify.

Another Housekeepers' Week

Special Sale of Kitchen Utensils October 12 to October 19

Our March "housekeepers' week" brought us so many new friends that we are resolved to have another. This time we are going to sell the famous Stransky Quadruple-Coated, Steel, Enameled Kitchen Ware at almost cost during the entire week—if our stock lasts that long. We do this at a loss in profit just because we want to show every woman in Blanktown what a great housekeepers' store this is.

Stransky's is "the ware that wears"—the very highest attainment in the manufacture of Enameled Kitchen Ware. The name "Stransky" has stood for years for the best Imported Quadruple-Coated Enameled Ware, and though it has been imitated to an extent, it has not been equaled in beauty or durability. Stransky ware is the despair of imitators.

We begin to-morrow a great sale of these celebrated kitchen utensils, every piece of which is strictly perfect and guaranteed to last five years.

impression should be removed by aggressive advertising to housekeepers. Much trade can be secured from this quarter that would otherwise go to department stores. In Fig. 6 is shown an example of an advertisement designed to draw housekeepers to the store. Note that in order to avoid overdisplay at the top, the words "Another Housekeepers' Week" have been set in outline type.

JEWELRY

9. Selling Points of Jewelry.—Jewelry is a luxury, not a necessity. People do not have to buy jewelry every week, every month, or every year. If the jeweler wants them to, he must advertise continuously. Probably three-fourths of the jewelry sold is used for gifts, and most of the gifts are made to women. The purchases may be made and the goods paid for by men, but the real demand is created by women. So, as a rule, the jeweler's advertisements designed to sell luxuries, should make quality the chief selling point and may be written directly or indirectly to women. The exceptions to this are found in the advertisements of men's watches, society emblems, and other articles intended strictly for men. In these days of dollar watches, 25-cent "diamond" studs, and 50-cent wedding rings, the jeweler's stock, store, windows, and advertisements should emphasize the fact that he is in no sense a competitor of the cheap-trinket dealer, but that he is supreme in his own high class. If he has a high-grade store, his advertisements should be dignified—contrasting strongly with the sensational announcements of the glass-diamond merchant. They should be free from technicalities, and in plain, convincing language appeal to one's desire for that which is permanently beautiful and valuable.

Jewelry is not only an adornment, but an outward and visible sign of prosperity and success. The man that wears cheap jewelry does so in the hope that it may be mistaken for the genuine article. In fact, the chief claim of the cheap jeweler is that his tawdry trash cannot be distinguished from the genuine. The secondary effect of all such advertising is to emphasize the real superiority of the genuine article. By skilfully wording his advertisements, the high-grade jeweler can take advantage of these involuntary testimonials as to the value of his goods and thus obtain the business of many that might otherwise practice false economy by buying imitation jewelry. Of course, there will always be many persons that will buy cheap jewelry because they lack the means to obtain better. The high-grade jeweler could not get their trade, but he can, by judicious advertising, sell to all that can purchase goods of quality. Good jewelry advertisements should make the high cost an argument in favor of the use of jewelry as gifts; point out the feeling of regard toward the giver created in the mind of the fortunate recipient, and the permanent value of precious metals and gems as expressions of esteem. In advertisements designed to sell the reader jewelry for his personal use, it is well to bring out the idea that a good piece of jewelry is an investment. For instance, it may be stated that a diamond can be sold at any time for nearly as much as was paid for it; that a good watch is a business necessity; etc.

In recent years, there has sprung up in almost all cities, jewelry stores that do a large instalment-plan business. While these stores do not get the highest class of trade, they nevertheless secure the patronage of many that wish to own diamonds, watches, etc. and cannot pay cash.

10. First-class illustrations are desirable in jewelry advertisements if they can be made to represent the high quality of the goods advertised adequately. Artistic line drawings are the best for newspapers.

The jewelry business is naturally greatest in June and in December, when large space may be profitably used. But it will pay to advertise continuously throughout the year. Birthdays, weddings, engagements, and anniversaries occur every day. The man without a good watch needs one at once, not next Christmas. Clocks and watches wear out or need repairing every day.

Spoons for the Bride

NOTHING makes a more acceptable wedding present than spoons. This season's productions, you can find an unexcelled combination of art and utility, and the present low price of silver places these most useful and beautiful presents within easy reach of all. We offer almost endless varieties of tea, dessert, soup, table, and special spoons, in both triple plate and sterling. Be sure to see them before deciding on a wedding present.

Own a Reliable Stylish Watch

A reliable timepiece is a necessity to every man that would be punctual—and punctuality is a prerequisite to success. Modern methods of watch making enable us to offer a fine Thin-Model American-Made Watch for $15. These watches are in 14-kt. gold-filled cases, are 7-jewel movements, guaranteed to wear well and to keep accurate time for ten years. They are as handsome as watches costing $75 or $100. The cases are just a little larger than the above illustration. We know all about these watches, and can recommend them. Come in and let us tell you more about them.

As a rule, each advertisement should specialize on one article or line of goods. The desire for a luxury must be created, and it is easiest to do this by focusing the attention of the reader on one particular thing. Advertising and other methods of salesmanship should impress the public with confidence in the jeweler. Conservative language and reasonable offers will accomplish this result.

11. Examples of Jewelry Advertisements.—In Fig. 7 is shown an example of an advertisement that would be appropriate for use just before the June-wedding season. It would be necessary to make a special cut for this advertisement, but the cut could be used a number of times. This is a point to be kept in mind in connection with the advertising of the small retailer, for if a cut could be used only once, the expense of making the drawing and the cut might be more than the cost of publishing the advertisement.

Even a small retailer can afford to have some special cuts, but most of them should be cuts that can be used a number of times.

Fig. 8 shows a large "wedding-season" advertisement that is full of suggestions. Fig. 9 shows the newsy kind of advertisement that a popular jeweler may use when he gets an attractive line of some special goods.

Advertisements of the class of that shown in Fig. 10 require the services of the artist, but by having a number of illustrations made at one time, the cost will not be great and an advertiser with an extensive trade like that of the Jaccard Jewelry Company could afford to have such special cuts made even if they could not be used a great many times. However, there are many retailers who can only occasionally afford an expense of from $2.50 to $10 for a drawing and a cut. Fig. 10 is a fine specimen of a high-grade jewelry advertisement. Figs. 11 and 12 show further suggestive specimens.

FURNITURE

12. The furniture dealer should be one of the heaviest retail advertisers. Although everybody must buy and use furniture, there are few other lines of retail business that need or will stand so much advertising. It is fortunate for the customer, but perhaps unfortunate for the dealer, that good furniture lasts a very long time. It is handed down from generation to generation or is passed along to poor relatives, all the time serving the purpose that newer or more stylish furniture might serve. People, as a rule, lack the initiative to start out to buy new furniture to replace the old, especially when the old is not useless but merely shabby or out of style. Advertising should furnish this initiative by suggesting the desirability of refurnishing the home with more beautiful and comfortable furniture, and may emphasize the economy of buying high-grade pieces. Such suggestive advertising creates business that would not otherwise exist.

13. In recent years, a number of concerns have advertised extensively to sell furniture direct from factory to consumer, and there is no doubt that they do sell thousands of dollars' worth of goods "right under the nose" of the retailer. But this does not hurt him so much as one might think. These mail-order dealers claim to sell cheaper than the retailer, and in many cases they do. But the first impulse of a prospective customer after receiving his catalog and price list is to go to the retailer's and price the same or similar goods to see if the mail-order dealer's price is really low. If the retailer is a good salesman, he should be able to prevent this business from going out of town and to get it himself, by pointing out that freight and cartage will raise the cost of the mail-order dealer's goods; that one cannot tell from a picture how well furniture is upholstered or finished; and that the customer is safer in buying from a local dealer that stands back of his goods, and that can quickly deliver at the door of the customer the goods that he has seen and selected.

There is no doubt that mail-order advertising furnishes the needed suggestions to many persons that finally purchase of the retailer goods they would not have thought of purchasing at all if they had not read the advertisements. But this idea of buying by mail is becoming very popular, and to protect his interest and hold his trade, the retailer must advertise. The business done by the mail-order dealer should furnish the retailer with an object lesson. The retailer should therefore cover the surrounding country well. Country people need new furniture as well as city people; and if they are informed that they can get as good furniture in a near-by city as they can get from the mail-order houses, they are likely to come to town and to go straight to the retailer that advertises for their trade. Country trade is usually cash trade and good trade. If Farmer Jones buys a new rocking chair, all the neighbors soon learn where he bought it and how much it cost, and such advertising by customers is the very best kind.

14. Furniture advertising should be continuous, but seasonable. Much of it should be directed particularly to women or young married couples just furnishing homes. Except in connection with special sales, it is best to advertise only one kind of furniture at a time. Good illustrations are necessary. First-class line cuts of the articles advertised should be used, or coarse-screen half tones if the paper can print them satisfactorily. Cheap illustrations that do not truthfully represent the advertised article are worse than none at all.

The advertiser of furniture should learn a great deal about the value, durability, and beauty of different kinds of woods and finishes. He should become acquainted with the various methods of manufacturing, so as to be able to explain clearly why certain kinds of construction and workmanship are superior to others. He should become informed on furniture history, so as to be able to explain entertainingly, the revival or modification of certain styles. A woman thinks more of a Chippendale or a Sheraton piece when she knows what it is. The advertiser should learn what kind of furniture is appropriate for different homes and rooms, so as to be able to assist customers in making proper selections. A little of this kind of information is as interesting in advertisements as in oral salesmanship. When he has informed himself on the artistic furnishing of dining rooms, dens, libraries, and parlors, in his advertisements of furniture for such purposes, he can offer to suggest schemes of room treatment. Another good plan is to make up and advertise lists of complete outfits for a new home ranging in price from $150 to $500. This scheme is especially valuable to instalment dealers. Young couples do not always know exactly what they need, and will call and find out what the list contains.

Furniture advertisements should always give concise but complete descriptions of the material and workmanship of the article advertised. Appearance, comfort, durability, rare wood, superior workmanship, price—these are all important selling points.

Undoubtedly the furniture advertiser should, as a rule, address himself more to women than to men. It is true that certain classes of furniture are sold to men exclusively, and it is also true that man and wife often shop together, but it is usually the woman on whom the first impression is made.

The ad-writer may profitably study the full descriptions given in the magazine advertisements of the mail-order dealer. Advertisements of furniture for wedding and Christmas presents should be inserted as early as May and November, respectively. Good furniture is expensive and people need time to make up their minds about getting it.

The attractive booklets issued by furniture manufacturers can be used to advantage. In fact, the retailer may find it profitable to get up a catalog or a booklet of his own.

15. Examples of Furniture Advertisements.—The advertisements shown in Figs. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18 are of sufficient variety to make plain the principles of good furniture advertising. The ad-writer must, of course, adapt his style to his audience. What would be appropriate for a high-grade store in Boston or some other large city might not be the most effective style for a country town of 2,000 population. Also, the offers of a cash store will differ from those who make a feature of the instalment plan of payment.

SHOES

16. Next to clothing, in the amount of retail advertising, comes shoes, and they should be advertised for the same reasons that apply to clothing. Many persons own only one pair of shoes at a time. Through advertising, such persons may be induced to purchase extra pairs for dress occasions. Those who have been in the habit of buying $3 shoes may be influenced, by advertising, to buy $5 shoes. Judicious advertising not only enables one dealer to meet the competition of another, but actually increases the cash receipts of both, because it induces people to buy more or better shoes.

The chief selling points of ready-made shoes are style, wear, and price. Fit is of secondary advertising value, as any one with a normal foot can be fitted in the modern shoe store.

The chief selling point of the custom shoemaker's advertisement, however, should be fit. Few persons have shoes made to order except those whose feet are abnormally shaped, or who are troubled with corns, bunions, or other foot troubles. A strictly hand-made custom shoe will, as a rule, wear longer than all but the highest-priced ready-made shoes. This point may be advertised as justifying the additional cost of made-to-order shoes.

Within recent years several shoe manufacturers have, through newspaper and magazine advertising, built up successful businesses, supplying shoes direct to the customer by mail or through their own local stores. To meet this competition, the retailer must advertise continuously and must use good copy. The advertisements and booklets of the mail-order dealers are, as a rule, very well written, and offer many suggestions for good retail copy.

GROCERIES

18. Selling Points of Groceries.—Women are the buyers of groceries, and the advertisements should be so written as to interest women. A grocer can do nothing more disastrous than to advertise an article of poor quality. The chief function of retail advertising is to attract new customers to the store, and the grocer should advertise only what will please the new purchaser and tend to make her a permanent customer; occasionally it may be advisable to advertise fancy groceries like preserves, cocoa, imported cheese, etc. As such advertisements appeal only to people of means, who want the best in everything regardless of cost, quality should be the chief selling point. But everybody, rich or poor, must have staple, ordinary groceries, and, generally speaking, these goods are the best kind to advertise. The price argument is the one that appeals most strongly to the thrifty housekeeper, who naturally desires to purchase the necessary articles of food at the lowest prices consistent with proper quality.

19. The article should be seasonable, the description appetizing, and the name and price prominently displayed. No one cares to be told what every one already knows, and in all kinds of advertisements of more or less familiar things, only the points of difference should be brought out: why the article advertised is more desirable or cheaper than the ordinary kind. This applies especially to staple groceries. On the other hand, advertisements of fancy groceries, fruits, etc. should appeal to the imagination by description of the taste, color, fragrance, or healthfulness of the article advertised.

Grocery advertising offers great opportunity for good descriptive writing. The advertisements may tell about the butter fresh from the farm every day, the fresh eggs, the pure maple syrup, etc. Purity and freshness are qualities that appeal strongly to the palate. The cleanliness of the store is a point that will support the advertising strongly. Sometimes, in grocery advertisements dealing with a number of items, very little descriptive copy is needed—just a word or two about the freshness, the quality, the flavor, etc.

CARICOL BLEND

Is the Tea That's Best for Icing

Iced Caricol is one of the best Summer drinks we know. It's invigorating. It's refreshing. It's economical. Caricol is a combination of five high-grade teas, blended by a superior method. These teas are tender young leaves of first pickings, full of the natural virtues of the plant. When iced, Caricol has none of the herby or acrid tang so common in some teas.

It's truly delicious and wholesome, a genuine thirst-quencher and tonic. And for such an excellent tea the price is extremely modest.

perishable fruits or vegetables. It makes it possible for the grocer to create a lasting trade in some special brand of butter, coffee, or flour of which he may have the exclusive sale. The profit on such an article may be very small, but if it attracts or holds customers, it is a valuable asset.

Illustrations are seldom required in grocery advertisements, but in some cases their use is very effective. This is especially true in the case of a trade-mark cut used in the advertisement of some exclusive-sale article.

20. Examples of Grocery Advertisements.—Figs. 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27 are written and displayed in a style suitable for a grocer. It is a good idea for a grocer to adopt one style of border and type for his advertisements, so that people may readily find his announcement. The grocer should be able to get along very well in most cities with a 4-inch, single-column advertisement each day, using larger space for a special sale or to advertise some brand such as that advertised in Fig. 24.

RESTAURANTS

21. In all but the largest cities, advertising should be a paying investment to the restaurant proprietor. As long as people must eat away from home, and as long as they may choose between different restaurants, there will be competition. The easiest way to meet and overcome competition is first to have a first-class restaurant and then to advertise judiciously.

The ideal that many have of good cooking is "the way mother used to do it." People do not, as a rule, eat at restaurants out of preference, but because they cannot go home to eat. Therefore, the restaurant that is most home-like in its furnishings, its service, and its cooking, is the one that will be the most popular, provided the public is told all about it through advertising. However, there is a class of people who will go to the exclusive, high-priced restaurant simply because of the unusual service, the music, etc., and the restaurant of this class must make a different kind of appeal. There are three classes of restaurant patrons: first, regular and weekly boarders—persons that live in rooms and take all their meals out; second, business men and women, residing in the suburbs, who eat only their midday meals in town; and, third, transients, who buy but one or two meals, and who have never eaten there before and may never eat there again.

The restaurant proprietor can well afford to cater to those of the first class. They are dependable, come whether it rains or shines, and induce their friends to join them temporarily or permanently. They get acquainted with one another, and eating with acquaintances makes one feel more at home. Eating a meal in a restaurant full of silent strangers is very much like dropping a half dollar into a slot machine and receiving so much "fuel" to be used in "keeping up steam."

The restaurant proprietor should make his price for weekly board as low as possible and advertise to obtain the patronage of regular boarders. The advertisement should draw mental pictures of the homelike atmosphere, the wholesome food, the variety of the bills of fare, the convenience of the location, etc. There is opportunity for first-class description when writing about juicy, broiled steaks, toothsome pastry, rich coffee, etc.

In smaller cities, where the restaurants may be profitably advertised, the midday meal is the principal one, the one most likely to attract business people and transients. Price, quick service, and the fare should be the chief selling points of advertisements designed to attract these classes of customers. The space used may be anywhere from 1 inch to 4 inches, and the insertions daily, every other day, or twice a week, the expenditure for advertising varying according to the time of year, the capacity of the restaurant, and the cost of space.

22. Examples of Restaurant Advertisements. Figs. 28, 29, 30, and 31 show several suggestive restaurant advertisements.

Fig. 28 shows a 1-inch advertisement of about the style that would be used by a restaurant in a rather large city where space is expensive. Note the strong display obtained in the small space.

LAUNDRIES

23. The modern city laundry, with its washing, drying, and ironing machines, requires a considerable volume of business in order to make fair profits. But its facilities are such that it can easily handle two or three times the amount of work required to pay expenses. A laundry running at full capacity is a profitable business, but it is likely to have strong competition. The best way to hold old customers is to treat them well; the best way to get new customers is to advertise the good treatment that they and their linen will receive. There is a popular notion that a laundry is a good place to send collars, cuffs, and shirts to be laundered, because of the superiority of the machine starching and ironing, but that laundry work wears out clothes quickly and that, compared with home washing, the cost is higher. There are many other objections to the methods and work of poor laundries. The enterprising proprietor should first do the work right, and then advertise his ability and intention to continue doing it right.

24. The advertiser should exploit the fact that his new method of ironing collars and cuffs absolutely does away with the saw-like edges characteristic of the ordinary machine laundry; that worn wristbands and neckbands will be replaced at nominal charges; that he uses nothing in the way of chemicals that will injure clothes; that he calls for and delivers work promptly; that he can execute rush orders in emergencies; and so on. Such advertising, however, is directed chiefly toward the "collar, cuff, and shirt" trade. People are likely to send these three classes of linen to some laundry—whichever is the best.

There is a great opportunity for good advertising in educating people to the notion of sending the entire family washing to the laundry. The housewife's chief objections to this plan are the cost and the wear on the clothes. Arguments that will overcome these objections and point out the advantages of laundry washing over home washing will make the advertisement effective. Regarding the matter of

Schaeffer display; Magazine border; body in

wear, the advertisement should explain that the improved machinery with which the laundry is equipped obviates the necessity of rubbing, or the possibility of tearing the clothes; that machine ironing is better and more even than hand ironing for plain materials, and does not scorch nor tear them; that plenty of filtered water is used in washing the clothes. As to the matter of cost, figures and results may be compared. The usual charge for family washing at the laundry is 5 cents a pound for washing and ironing all plain pieces, 75 cents a dozen for washing and ironing such pieces as cannot be ironed on the machine. The cost of family washing and ironing done at home will amount to about $1.75, allowing $1 for the washerwoman's day's wages, and the remainder for soap, bluing, and coal, the washerwoman's dinner, and the wear of implements. It should not be a very difficult matter to demonstrate to the housewife that, even at a slightly higher cost, it is better to have the washing done at the laundry and thus be rid of the annoyance and discomfort of home washing.

Women's Work Our Specialty

Display in Schœffer and De Vinne; Bowman border

The tendency of modern housekeeping is to solve the servant-girl problem by the elimination of all such laborious tasks as washing, scrubbing, etc. A great many women prefer to do without a girl if they can avoid hard and disagreeable labor. The laundry man that recognizes this trend and makes it easy and economical for the housewife to do her own housekeeping, will build up a permanent business among a desirable class of customers.

Another special feature that may be brought out in the advertisement is the care and skill with which difficult work is executed at the laundry. Lace curtains, shirt waists, white vests, duck suits, and fancy underskirts are seldom done up

Neckbands Put on Your Shirts Free

Does your neckband ever dig your neck? Are the button holes so worn that they will not hold the buttons? Is the band so stretched as to make it difficult to put your collar on?

If so, the neckband needs replacing by a new one. Your wife, if you have one, cannot do this properly—the proper making and placing in position of a neckband is an art.

We have a seamstress in our laundry who will do this for you—do it right—and we will charge you absolutely nothing for her service. Moreover, you don't have to tell us every time you want a new band put on—we watch your garments and keep them in good repair all the time. If you are not a patron of this laundry, become one—such a service as that of our free repair department makes it worthy of your consideration.

satisfactorily by the washerwoman. Particular housewives usually try to do this work themselves, and will not think of entrusting it to the laundry unless invited to do so in the advertisements. Generally speaking, people have somewhat narrow views as to the possibilities of the laundry. Varied and continuous advertising will give them broader knowledge of, and greater confidence in, the superior advantages of laundry work.

From 2 to 4 inches two or three times a week should be ample space for a laundry of ordinary capacity. Circulars or booklets sent out with the goods supplement the other advertising strongly. Appropriate illustrations are desirable but not essential. Of necessity, they can only serve as eye catchers or suggest the excellence of the work. Plain convincing arguments, businesslike requests for patronage, and good display are the chief essentials of effective laundry advertisements.

25. Examples of Laundry Advertisements.—Figs. 32, 33, 34, and 35 offer a few suggestions for laundry advertisements.

CROCKERY

26. Women are the buyers of china and glassware, and crockery-store advertisements should suggest to them the necessity of replenishing their supply of tableware or the desirability of beautifying the home with lamps, bric-à-brac, cut glass, etc. In advertisements designed to sell the ordinary and necessary varieties of tableware and kitchen utensils, price should be the chief selling point and quality a strong second. In advertisements of luxurious furnishings, quality should be the chief selling point, strengthened by appeals to the housekeeper's pride of having dainty furnishings and her natural desire to make the home attractive.

Styles in fancy crockery are likely to change, and the necessity of moving goods of waning popularity will often give the dealer opportunity to offer some genuine bargains in high-grade articles, when, of course, price will be prominent as a selling point. The dealer should have one or more bargain tables for disposing of these, and add to the interest of his bargains by selling now and then at cost, some new thing. Like all others, the crockery business has its busy and its dull seasons; only in few lines of retail trade is it so easy to maintain a steady demand by continuous advertising.

During the holidays, cut glass, bric-à-brac, fancy lamps, fine china, dinner sets, etc. are the things to advertise. In the spring, when every housewife is either cleaning house or moving, common ware and kitchen utensils should be given first place. It is the time of home inventory, as it were. The housekeeper discovers what dishes or utensils are missing or worn out, and advertisements that suggest a replenishment of her stock will be effective.

In both spring and fall, many young couples begin housekeeping, and advertisements for complete sets of china, kitchen outfits, ordinary lamps, etc. are in order. The crockery dealer always comes in for his share of June wedding-present sales if he asks for it. The advertisements at this time should be similar to those used during the holidays, but should dwell especially on articles likely to be prized by the young housekeeper. Suggest such presents as a set of dainty ice-cream plates or salad plates, a cut-glass pitcher with half a dozen tumblers, etc. People go to housekeeping at all times of the year, and dishes and kitchen utensils break or give out every day, so it is the dealer's own fault if he does not keep his clerks busy by continuous advertising.

27. Fine china or glassware cannot easily be represented in a newspaper illustration. When illustrations are to be used, articles having strong but beautiful outlines should be selected. For instance, it is almost impossible to illustrate a fine Haviland china plate in a newspaper, but an odd-shaped teapot or an artistically arranged group of pieces may be represented satisfactorily. Illustrations for this class of advertising must be bold and of fair size.

In Fig. 36 is shown an example of a crockery-store advertisement. The open-stock idea brought out in this advertisement is a strong one where the china is of a grade that many can afford only by buying a little at a time.

Open Stock Dinner Sets

Before buying her china, the young housewife should consider the advantages of open-stock patterns. We have three such patterns in beautifully decorated genuine French china, a full set (116 pieces) of which sells for only

Because it is an open-stock pattern, you can buy $10 worth or $25 worth at a time, as you see fit. If you break any piece, it can be quickly replaced, and you can always keep your set complete. We can't explain in an advertisement how dainty and pretty these sets are. Come in and see them for yourself.

BANKS

28. The aim of bank advertising should be to encourage the opening of an account, however small, and frequent, steady additions thereto. It is not the interest paid by the banks that enables poor people to become wealthy, but the habit of saving. There are so many things that a man wants that when he receives any considerable amount of money, the tendency is to gratify his wants. Savings-bank advertisements must teach the advantages of self-denial and of abstinence from the transient pleasures of the hour for the sake of the substantial comforts of the coming years. The tendency of "young America" is to live from "hand to mouth," to spend all or a little more than he earns, to live the life of the man he wants to be rather than the man he is. The savings-bank advertisement that convinces a young man that the road to riches lies in spending a little less than he earns, is doing him and his country a great service, and, incidentally, is building up its own business. There are a multitude of good arguments that can be brought out in bank advertisements as to the advantages of systematic saving.

The young man earning a small salary should save in order that he may have something on hand for times of sickness, loss of work, or any other emergency; especially if he has, or expects to have, others dependent on him. A little money put away each month will be sufficient to pay premiums on an insurance policy that will protect his relatives or his family in the event of his death. Every working man, if he is carrying an insurance policy, should have a savings account so as to insure the prompt payment of the premiums. All such arguments appeal to a young man that desires to pay his own way and to care for those dependent on him.

Another strong line of argument is to appeal to a young man's ambition—to point out that a reputation for thrift will give his employers confidence in him, and incline them to trust him in a responsible position. The young man that can save for himself can save for his employers. Again, many men have been able to grasp fine business opportunities because of a few hundred dollars of ready money. Neither savings nor interest alone make a man rich, but judicious investments may. He should always be preparing for his opportunity. Then, when it comes, he will be ready.

The moral effect of the saving habit can hardly be overestimated. The man that pays for his goods and always lives within his means is bound to be an honest business man. Fast living and defalcation are twins. So are temperate living and honest wealth. A resolve to put in the bank all, or nearly all, the wages not required to meet running expenses will prevent any man from living extravagantly or from forming expensive habits.

29. Parents should be urged to start savings accounts for their children and advised to encourage their children to save the pennies. It will provide for them, in later years, the education that is to train them for success in life, and the habit of saving formed in childhood will last throughout life and insure a comfortable old age. In advertisements of this kind, figures showing the growth of money through the compounding of interest are especially valuable. An appeal should be made to parents to encourage thrift in their children by setting an example of saving. It is a good plan to watch the birth announcements and then send a personal invitation, by letter, to the parents to open an account for the baby.

A suggestion may be made to the husband that he should give such an allowance to his wife that she may have her own bank account, or that he turn over all his money to her if she is the better saver of the two. Good money-saving plans should be suggested. A prize might be offered for the best one submitted to the bank. The security of bank deposits may be dwelt on; also, the danger to money and life in keeping large sums in the house. The insertion of such advertisements immediately after a burglary or some other crime with robbery as its motive would be timely.

If a bank has a safe-deposit vault with boxes for rent, it will pay to advertise this service specially, for box renters are likely to become depositors.

30. The secrets of a great man's success are always sought for, and the sayings of successful men relating to thrift and saving are effective in savings-bank advertisements.

There can be no question as to the necessity of maintaining a high plane in bank advertisements. Few working men have much business experience, and they are inclined to be overcautious in entrusting the little surplus of their hard-earned wages into the hands of strangers. But right here is one of the chief benefits of continuous advertising. A working man that reads the advertisement of a local bank every day becomes fully acquainted with the institution. He feels that it is more interested in his welfare than some institution of which he knows nothing except that its board of directors is composed of a number of wealthy men that live in a different world from his. To overcome his timidity and encourage him to make a start, the advertising should have a friendly tone, should make clear to him that his little account will receive as careful attention as the largest account.

While bank advertising should be dignified and no invidious comparisons should be made with other banks,

Another Robbery

One day comes the story of some $600 stolen from a North End home and on its heels another of similar tenor from the West Side. This West Side man lost $400 because he seemed to have more faith in his trunk than in the bank. He lost his money, and he is probably fortunate that he did not lose his life.—Daily News.

everything, such as convenient location, special service, etc., should be used as selling points. If a bank makes it a point to pay women depositors with crisp, new bills, that point is worth mentioning.

31. The advertisements and booklets of banks advertising for mail accounts will be of great assistance to the local ad-writer. In beginning to advertise a bank, he should acquaint himself with the general policy of the institution, the character of its business, and the class of customers it fied and conservative style; in others, more aggressive methods may be adopted. Purely soliciting advertisements should be varied at times by those of an educational character, explaining the different kinds of service the bank can render. In cities where there is considerable competition and uniform rates of interest, this matter of service is very important. The bank that best takes care of its customers will get the most business.

Besides assuring the prospective depositor that he will be welcome, bank advertising should impress him with the solidity of the bank that is to be his investor. Humor, frivolity, or sensationalism are distinctly out of place in any kind of financial advertising, but especially so in the announcement of a savings bank. Too strenuous appeals for business would suggest to the reader that the bank is greatly in need of money. A bank advertisement that reads like those of gold-mine or oil-well promoters will drive business away.

If a high rate of interest is offered, it should be explained carefully how such a rate can be profitably paid. The rate of interest paid should by no means be the chief selling point of the advertisement; in fact, many savers prefer to deposit in a bank not paying the very highest rate. It is a fairly safe assumption in financial investments of any kind that the risk increases with the dividends. The fact that wealthy investors prefer small but sure profits to larger and more uncertain returns, is a great object lesson to the small investor.

Bank advertisements should be continuous. People earn wages all the time, and will spend them if they do not save them. More new accounts can be created in the winter than in the summer.

32. Examples of Bank Advertisements.—In Figs. 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41 are shown bank advertisements that bring out many of the points just considered. Illustrations that are appropriate and high grade may be used effectively in advertisements of this kind, but cheap cuts, mere eye catchers, etc., should be avoided.

MISCELLANEOUS EXAMPLES OF RETAIL ADVERTISEMENTS

33. Figs. 42 to 54, inclusive, show further examples of well-prepared retail advertisements. Hundreds of pages could be filled with such examples, but those shown in this Section and in other Sections that deal with retail management and with the writing of copy are sufficient to demonstrate the kind of advertising required to make retailing successful. While the selling points brought out are not the same in a bakery advertisement as in a real-estate advertisement or an announcement of an address at a Young Men's Christian Association, the ad-writer must in each case work on precisely the same principles in his study of the commodity, the plan by which it can be best advertised, and the people to whom it is to be advertised.

A Perfect Shaving Soap

DO YOU SUFFER even the slightest bit in your shaving? Does the beard seem to grasp the razor and hold on until it is yanked out? Does your razor slip over the hairs and not cut clean? Is your face sore and harassed after a shave?

If you have any of these and many more troubles in shaving, we have relief for you. Sanderson's Shaving Soap is the result of years of careful, scientific, and practical experimenting. It is absolutely pure, which means it will harm no skin, however tender. It comes in a porcelain jar, and, while it forms a rich, thick, moist lather under the brush, the Soap itself does not get soft or soggy—which means economy, cleanliness and comfort. Its composition makes it get right at the root of the beard and makes the beard soft and easily cut—with proper length of lathering—and it leaves a clean shave and a smooth, comfortable, freshened skin 15 Cents a Jar prepared in Virginia in the famous old Virginia way, beginning with the raising of the hogs themselves, which are fed on sweet Virginia peanuts out in the woods. The hams are carefully spiced and seasoned according to an old Southern receipt and, after being smoked with hickory wood, are laid away for two years in hickory ashes.

These fine hams are here now in generous supply for the summer season, when they are particularly delicious for serving at luncheon, teas, and picnics. 32½c a lb.

Virginia Gordon Bacon, prepared just as carefully as the hams; comes in strips at 26c a lb.

The House You've Been Looking For

"Not in a row"; the sort of house you knew "back home." Yard—front, back, and side; porch—large and roomy and covered. The size: Six rooms, hall and attic. The price—and that's one of the very greatest features—$3,975.

The houses are new, never been occupied, remarkably well built, finished in hardwood throughout. They are as beautiful and perfect as a piece of furniture fresh from the factory. The heat is hot water.

There never has been anything like these offered in Washington under a much higher figure. All we ask is a chance to show you.

Trouble With Baby's Food? Get Holstein Milk

¶ If you are having trouble to find the food that just suits your baby, probably the simplest way out of your difficulty is to try Holstein milk. Many have found it so—and the reason is just here—ease of digestion. Holstein milk does not form a hard, tough curd in the baby's delicate little stomach. Other milks do. Most of them are too heavily loaded with fat, and fat is grease, and grease is not suitable for your baby or any other baby to eat. The milk of a Holstein cow is very different from other milks, but it digests in a baby's stomach in much the same way and with the same ease that mother's milk digests.

¶ Ask the doctor.

¶ Will supply you Holstein milk for your baby, in sterilized bottles, at 10 cents a quart. Daily deliveries. Phone 308 Main.

DEPARTMENT-STORE MANAGEMENT

INTRODUCTION

1. Department-store advertising differs from other retail advertising more in degree than in kind. It is, in its present highly perfected system, retail advertising carried to its highest power. Most of the underlying principles of successful publicity work are the same for the small haberdasher and the huge retail establishment covering many acres. But the adaptation of these principles to their greater scope develops many new problems, of which it is the purpose of this Section to treat.

The difference between the work of advertising a specialty retail store and that of a department-store advertising manager may be illustrated by comparing the work of a single musician—a violinist, for example—and that of an orchestra leader. It is obvious that both the violinist and the leader are governed by the same musical laws. The general principles underlying their work are the same for each. But where the violinist has only to watch and play his individual score, the leader must understand, follow, direct, and bring into harmony a dozen or more such scores. The leader must be thoroughly familiar with the difficulties, advantages, and characteristics of many different instruments; he must know when and how to bring out the best that is in each and how to make one support another when necessary. Above all, he must learn how to bring the whole into perfect coordination, so that the united work will be a single, finished result. In a corresponding manner, the department-store manager must direct the advertising of his departments, being careful to bring out to the fullest power the advantages of each, to make the weak departments draw strength and support from the strong ones, and yet to harmonize the whole into a smooth, well-rounded, well-balanced composite. An orchestra in which little besides the cornet or the drums can be heard would hardly be entitled to the name; in the same way, a department-store that permits any one of the departments to overshadow the rest would not be considered well managed.

THE DEPARTMENT STORE

ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT

2. Definition.—In the modern and proper acceptance of the term, a department store is a store in which a number of different lines of business are grouped under one roof and under one business title, yet with their direct management and their accounts kept distinct and separate. In late years, it has become almost universal to group these various lines under a single general management and a single ownership.

3. Origin of the Department Store.—The department store is an outgrowth of the policy of combination, or cooperation, with a view to reducing running expenses. For example, a hatter, a clothier, and a shoe dealer might agree to occupy a building in common and to contribute toward the rent, the cost of advertising, lighting, heating, and insurance, and other running expenses, in proportion to the space each occupied. It is obvious that there would be a saving to each in this plan; also, that while it would be necessary to adopt a single business name in which the lease might be taken and the advertising done, yet each "department" could be run independently, paying its own help and taking its own profits. So far as is known, this idea was first developed in Europe, but it has been carried to its fullest extent in America.

4. Economies Effected by Adding New Lines of Business.—It would soon be found, under the conditions just given, that new economies and advantages would be gained for each new line of business added, provided it was successfully conducted and was one that reinforced those already installed. The hatter, the clothier, and the shoe dealer, for instance, would have their busy seasons at practically the same time; if, then, they could add to their combination some other line that would have its busy season at the time they were dullest, they could decrease their own spaces during such time and allow the newcomer to carry the burden and help them through their "slow" months. Thus, the practice grew of "leasing" departments, either for this purpose or for the utilization of vacant space.

5. Tendency to Concentration of Ownership.—It was inevitable that in such combinations as the one described there would be one man or firm stronger financially or more able commercially than the rest, who would gradually acquire the interests of the others. Leased departments that proved successful were soon bought out or displaced. The logical tendency was to concentrate ownership. As power grew under that ownership, new departments were added, and today, the original form of combination has been almost entirely outgrown and the practice of leasing departments, while still common, is rapidly disappearing.

Nevertheless, some of the old forms survive, because they had good business reason and advantages. Although all the departments may be (and they usually are) owned by the same man or firm, they are still conducted independently of one another in their direct management and their book-keeping. Instead of independent owners, there are now independent "buyers" for each line of goods; and instead of receiving the profits of their departments, as the owners did when the departments were individually and separately owned, the buyers receive a salary (often a portion of the profits, in addition), and they are under the control of one general management. But the various departments still contribute to the rent in proportion to the space occupied; they are charged pro rata with the lighting, heating, insurance, advertising, and other running expenses; they are charged independently for their help; and their accounts of purchases, sales, and profits are kept as rigidly distinct as if they were really separate stores.

6. Points of Distinction Between Department Stores and Others.—The essential thing that distinguishes a department store is not necessarily the use of that word in advertising or in common speech, but the grouping of different lines of goods under one roof and under one general firm name and management, but otherwise under separate direction and accounting. The “general” store of the country crossroads, carrying everything from aniseed to anvils and molasses to millinery, is not a department store—although often said to be the prototype of it—because there is no real separation of the lines in management or bookkeeping. Nor is a store that, for convenience, divides into departments different branches of the same kind of goods a department store in the true sense. A store that has a silk department, a dress-goods department, and a cotton-and-white-goods department is not a department store; it is merely a dry-goods store, because all its departments are branches of the same kind of merchandise.

7. It is often difficult to say just when a specialty store or single-line store becomes a department store through the addition of merchandise lines. Fortunately, however, the advertising man is seldom called on to make the distinction. As a rule, it is wiser not to refer to a store as a department store in any case. The term has a rather unpleasant sound to many persons, it being often associated with a superficial and incomplete gathering of stocks of small variety and restricted choice, the whole heralded as, for example, a “dress-goods department.” The prejudice against such ill-stocked and ill-managed "departments" is sometimes deserved; in other cases, it is most decidedly undeserved. Nevertheless, it exists, and one of the first things an advertising man must learn is to understand and avoid the dangers of such prejudices. It is for this reason that the advertising men of several large and properly managed department stores never refer to the "dress-goods department," the "clothing department," or any other "department." They use such terms as "dress-goods store," "clothing section," etc.

8. Economic Reasons for Department Stores.—The only reason that a department store can give for its existence is that it provides better service to the public. This better service may be brought about by any one of the following factors, or by two or three in combination:

1. Low prices.
2. Larger stocks and greater variety.
3. Increased convenience in shopping, free delivery, etc.

The economic advantages secured by the concentration of various lines of business under one roof and one management—thus saving rent and selling expense—and the advantage of concentrating a volume of business through one outlet—thus permitting large and economical purchasing—enable a department store to undersell its scattered and distinct competitors. If it does not undersell or give its customers other advantages, the department store has no logical right to exist at all, and will not be able to stand long against the natural laws of business.

ORGANIZATION AND POLICY

9. General Organization of a Department Store. The typical department-store organization can be most easily understood if it is considered broadly as a group of entirely separate stores under one roof, each having its own manager, its own force, its own customs and traditions, to a large extent its own methods, and to some extent its own customers—subject only to a general managerial supervision on broad points of policy and merchandising.

10. The buyer is the head of a department, and is responsible for its success. In all matters of routine action and direct, executive control, he is, in stores that are best managed, as much the master of his department as if he owned it outright. He is the sole arbiter of what goods shall be carried and the prices at which they shall be sold; he is held by his superiors only to a certain limit of investment and to the showing of a certain percentage of profit on the amount of money he uses, these checks usually being exercised by the general manager or the merchandise man. The buyer usually decides on the engaging of his help and almost invariably on their dismissal. In the larger stores, his staff usually consists of the assistant buyer, who acts simply as his lieutenant and is in command during his absence, and the head of stock, who is usually the head salesman or saleswoman, and is responsible for the keeping and the appearance of the merchandise displayed and, customarily, for the training of salespeople.

11. The superintendent has general charge of the help of the entire store; he formulates the rules that govern them and sees that such rules are lived up to, through his representatives, the floor walkers. In most stores, the superintendent does the actual engaging and dismissing of the help, and fixes the salaries paid. He is usually in charge of the building itself, taking care, through his assistants—the engineer, the carpenter, and the head porter—of all cleaning, alterations, and repairs that do not involve actual changes of space devoted to departments or the moving of fixtures. The superintendent has usually nothing whatever to do with the actual merchandising, and therefore nothing to do with the advertising, unless, of course, he combines the duties of manager or merchandise man with his own.

12. The merchandise man is a comparatively recent addition to the ordinary department-store organization; but is now employed in nearly all stores of this kind except the very smallest. Large stores sometimes have two or three merchandise men. The merchandise man specializes on a branch of duty formerly performed by the general manager, the advertising manager, or sometimes the superintendent. He is the check on the buyers, it being his duty to pass upon the advisability of all purchases before they are actually made. It is his constant aim to keep the stock down and the sales and profits up. Next to the general manager, the merchandise man is usually the highest-salaried member of the entire organization. If the store is in a large city, he usually has a staff of shoppers—that is, women of trained taste and good appearance—whom he uses to test the offers and values of competitors by sending them to see or buy goods, as ordinary customers. In stores that have no merchandise man, the shoppers are usually a part of the staff of the advertising manager, who must in such cases perform many of the duties of the merchandise man.

13. The floor walkers, or, as they generally prefer to be called, aisle managers or floor managers, are very important members of a department-store organization, but they seldom receive the appreciation that they deserve. They are the direct representatives of the firm on the selling floors. By tradition and by the usual routine, they act for the house, enforcing regard for the regulations on everybody connected with the selling organization, the buyer included. There is consequently more or less coolness existing between the floor walkers and the sales force, but this is usually considered as salutary and tending toward a rigid discipline on the floor; indeed, it is often actually encouraged by the management.

A floor walker in a busy store is a very busy man, with multifarious duties. It is his duty to assist and direct customers, greeting such as he knows personally; to watch and direct the sales force, to know about their going and coming, to grant excuses for short absences from the floor, to arrange lunch times; to sign various forms of receipts and authorizations for the return of goods and the refunding of money; to be all over his section at once, and yet always be quiet, dignified, calm, and dispassionate. In many stores, it is the duty of the floor walker to check up the advertising; that is, to see that the goods advertised are on sale, to see that salespeople are properly instructed about change of prices and special offers, and to report to the management if the goods do not properly come up to their advertised claims.

14. The head bookkeeper has charge of all the accounting of the firm. His staff usually consists of a cashier and a paymaster, with the usual ledger keepers and accountants.

The duties of the credit man, the head of the delivery, the engineer, the carpenter, and the head porter require no explanation. In large stores, each of these men has a staff of from ten to fifty persons, the delivery head sometimes having as many as three hundred.

Each of these various officers runs his own particular department, or branch of duty, without any interference outside of that provided by the nature of the organization itself. The whole force is, of course, under the control and direction of the general manager, who is, in many stores, the proprietor himself.

There remains to be mentioned only one important office, namely, that of the advertising manager, which will be considered in detail.

ORGANIZATION, DUTIES, AND POWERS OF THE ADVERTISING OFFICE

STAFF OF THE ADVERTISING OFFICE

15. The staff of the advertising office in a properly organized store of large size is made up as follows:

The advertising manager, who has general charge.

The assistant advertising manager, who is the advertising manager's lieutenant and executive officer.

One or more copy writers, or "reporters," for the work of preparing detail and advertising copy.

One or more artists, for the making of advertising illustrations and fashion drawings.

The window trimmer, with his assistants.

The card writer, with his assistants.

A staff of shoppers, for keeping in touch with the offers of competitors. These are often controlled by the merchandise man.

Such stenographers, office boys, messengers, etc. as the work requires.

The size of the staff of an advertising office depends, of course, on the importance of the store. In many stores, even in cities of good size, the entire work, including the correspondence, is done by one man and an office boy or a stenographer. In small stores, the advertising man often does the window trimming and card writing, and by attending to all three branches of work, commands a salary that the store could not afford to pay for the advertising work only. In larger stores, however, the staff is about the same as that given in the preceding list, such stores as that of Marshall Field & Company, of Chicago, or the Siegel-Cooper Company, of New York, carrying as many as fifty names on the pay roll of the advertising department.

DUTIES AND POWERS OF THE ADVERTISING MANAGER

16. Theoretical Duties.—The advertising manager of a department store is, strictly speaking, responsible only for the publicity of his store. Everything that comes under the head of advertising is usually turned over to him. This covers not only the newspaper, magazine, and bill-board work, but usually all the printing, the task of giving interviews to solicitors and newspaper reporters, and, in many stores, the duty of attending to requests for donations and charitable assistance.

17. Actual Duties.—In actual practice, however, the duties of the advertising manager are often extended far beyond the limits just mentioned. In a broad sense, he is responsible for the increasing of sales. This responsibility is of course primarily that of the general manager or the merchandise man, but the advertising department is the chief weapon in the battle, and it is this department that will customarily be blamed if its efforts fail. The up-to-date advertising manager does not wait for instructions from his superiors. He assumes at once a great share of the duty of seeing that the store is advancing and improving. His field of action is not his own office, but the entire store.

OUTLINING A POLICY

18. In order to bring out clearly the various problems that an advertising manager of a large department store will be called on to solve, these points will be taken up in their logical order.

Assuming that a working force has been organized, it will first be necessary for the advertising manager about to take charge to consider carefully the advertising policy to be adopted. This depends on the class of readers to which the advertisements are to be especially addressed, which, in turn,

Another example of bargain advertising The characteristics of heavily displayed prices and claims of reduction of price are similar to the preceding examples of Class B. In this case, however, the advertiser is somewhat more explanatory and argumentative. Note the crowded space and confusing abundance of display. Contrast Figs. 5 and 6 with Fig. 4. 26

An example of the "compromise style," or Class C, advertising, which aims to retain the vigor and strength of the bargain style in its display and tone, yet avoids bombastic diction and exaggerated language. Note the short introductions, the forcible, direct statements, the absence of generalities, and the terse but comprehensive descriptions. Compare with Figs. 8 and 9

Men's $2.50 Sample Hats, $1 | Final Round-Up of Boys' Clothing | Men's $3.50 to $5.00 Shoes, $2.40

Compare this example with Fig. 7, which advertises the same sort of clearance sale in men's clothing. Fig. 8 is undoubtedly the more artistic in arrangement and illustration but is probably less effective than the example shown in Fig. 7. Note the absence of the words "Men's Clothing" from the principal headline. The ad writer relied on the illustration to carry the clothing idea—a dangerous practice.

10,000 pairs have been reported to roost by the sea on the Atlantic including every island from Maine and N.Y. We also know that they breed on the Gulf Islands (Mexico) but only regularly on the Gulf of Mexico. The question may arise why we should bother the sending of mail orders to-day. First the number of the patients to whom we have completed a complete course of treated drug-free, who both after your return by mail with our drug-free and general medicine as a personal gift. Then, the thousands of treatment units obtained by the use of the otherwise most of our great sea order department, compared to the thousands that order from a foreign, a business of the sea and not the land.

Unparalleled bargains in new 1903 silk belts and jewelry.

Now, there is an article that gives a very important clue to the make-up of a woman's outfit, and there is a possibility that you can use it to complete your fashion picture. We mention this particularly after having a lot of girls have decided to buy some beautiful hats from one of the famous hat shops in the world, or a big department store. We know the whole problem for the fashion world is to get the order going. We want you to order early for each afternoon, because as time goes on, you will see the fashion and extraordinary changes in the shape of clothes. Now, if you are in need of a new hat, it may be just a matter of time before it is decided to make new hats in this shape and of the other. So, you can make alterations in your depends greatly on the character of the merchandise and the merchandising policy of the store.

19. Classes of Stores.—Department stores may roughly be divided into three great classes, which for convenience, will be designated as Class A, Class B, and Class C.

Class A is the "high-class" store, which carries fine goods, caters to a well-to-do set of people, and relies for custom on the character of its merchandise rather than on low prices. (Typical examples of advertisements of stores of this class are shown in Figs. 1, 2, and 3.)

Class B is the "bargain" store, which makes its appeal on the basis of low prices rather than on the character of its merchandise. (Typical examples of advertisements of stores of Class B are shown in Figs. 4, 5, and 6.)

Class C is the "middle-class" store, which combines the two policies just mentioned, carrying fine goods for those who wish them, but using the low-price argument freely. (Figs. 7, 8, and 9 show advertisements of stores of Class C.)

Typical examples of these three great divisions will undoubtedly occur to every reader. The third, or middle-class store, is decidedly the most common, the bargain class probably ranking a close second in number. But, to a greater or smaller extent, types of all three are found in every city having more than 50,000 population. The high-class store is usually not a true department store at all, being more strictly a dry-goods house with added lines of wearing apparel; but for the present purpose, it will be treated as a department store because its advertising problems are the same.

NOTE.—Not all the reproductions of department-store advertisements used in this Section are perfect examples of good copy and display. They are reproduced rather to show the various styles used by leading stores in the different seasons. Because many of these examples are full newspaper pages (shown reduced), it should not be concluded that a half page or even less space is not often the proper size of advertisement for the department store to use.

20. Necessity of Reflecting the Policy and Class of Store in Advertising.—It should never be forgotten that the advertising man is the mouthpiece of the establishment. His policy, style, language, and methods must accurately reflect the policy and character of the store for which he speaks. To this extent, the advertising man's policy is usually decided for him before he begins. On large, general principles, the advertising man must not permit his work to reflect his own personal tastes or preferences, unless they happen to be in harmony with the class of goods carried and the avowed policy of the store management. It would be disastrous, for example, to adopt a sensational, bargain-shrieking style like that shown in Fig. 5 for a store that depended on the trade of persons of wealth and refinement. On the other hand, a quiet, dignified, "cultured" style like that shown in Fig. 1 would never do for the typical bargain store. The most successful advertisers are those who can best adapt themselves to the given conditions. It is the first duty of a new advertising man to give careful study to the conditions that surround him, and especially to study the audience to which he is to appeal.

This point is obviously not one that can be settled off-hand. It is one of many points in advertising in which success depends on the exercise of intelligence, good taste, and common sense. If the division of stores into classes were strictly and sharply on the lines given in Art. 19, it might be easier, but that classification is only given broadly, and nearly all stores reach for all the business they can get, regardless of class. Nevertheless, each has a field—be it high class, bargain class, or middle class—in which it is strongest, and the advertising man must decide for himself how he can best exploit that field in particular and still gain what he can from other fields in general.

21. Strongest Position for a Store.—It is plain to be seen that the strongest position for a store to occupy in order to cover the largest field is the middle position, from which it can, so to speak, reach both up and down for business; that is, "up" into the fine-goods class and "down" into the bargain class. It is this position that most of the best stores of America seek to occupy, although a study of their advertising shows that there are almost innumerable divisions even in this middle class, some reaching higher, and some lower. In this connection, it will be well to observe carefully the advertisement shown in Fig. 10 and also the typical advertisements shown in Figs. 7, 8, and 9. The latter are advertisements of middle-class stores, but there are marked differences among them. This difference is almost entirely due to the individuality of the advertising man as expressed in his own solution of the first problem, namely, adopting a style that will prove most effective and interest the greatest number of the people within the scope of his merchandise.

This example illustrates how stores of the Class C type occasionally use the bargain argument. Practically every item is at a reduced price, but the prices are not displayed nor are heavy headlines used. The tone is quiet, and the arrangement clean, symmetrical, and attractive. Compare with Fig. 5.

22. Merchandise as the Deciding Factor.—The “reach out” of a store for business above or below its principal field must depend, first of all, on what merchandise it has to offer. Obviously, it would be a waste of space to make appeals to persons of any class unless one had the merchandise or the bargains to satisfy such people when they came to the store. The point may seem too simple to require comment, but many advertisers err by making their advertising either too “fine” or too “cheap” for the class of goods carried.

NOTE.—No unpleasant discrimination is intended in the use of the words “up” and “down,” and “fine” and “cheap.” The words are employed as those easiest to understand. In fact, from the standpoint of an advertising man, it is much more difficult to advertise so-called cheap goods than fine goods. The largest remuneration to advertising men today is paid to the advertisers of the middle and bargain class.

OUTLINING A STYLE

TYPES OF CUSTOMERS

23. Importance of the Right Tone.—A new advertising manager, by a careful study of the character of goods carried and the class of trade in which the store finds its greatest custom, having settled in his own mind the general policy to be adopted, is next confronted with the question of how that policy can best be reflected in his advertising. In other words, he must settle on the style of his announcements, the term meaning here not the typographical style, but what might be called the "literary" style; that is, the tone and manner of the appeal to the public.

This is a matter that depends largely on the intelligence and good taste of the individual and is another of those points which put the profession of advertising far above the class of a mere trade and into the highly paid lines occupied by brain workers. Success in this line of work must necessarily and properly depend on the inherent common sense and adaptability of the advertising man rather than on his mastership of rules and formulas. What follows, therefore, should be accepted merely as general guidance.

24. Necessity of Considering Individual Types of Customers.—The principles that control the preparation of an appeal to any class of the public differ little from the principles that would guide a person in addressing individuals. A method that is followed by some of the best-known writers of advertising is to select as a type some known person of the class addressed, and to consider everything in the light of what that person would think of it.

The three great classes of department-store customers, then, may be represented by three individuals. As about 85 per cent. of the business of all department stores is done with women, each of the individual types will be represented by a woman.

Type A.—Mrs. A is the wife of a millionaire manufacturer and the daughter of a wealthy lawyer. She is a college graduate and was brought up from childhood in an atmosphere of wealth, refinement, and luxury. She is well read and well traveled, leads in her social circle, and spends from $5,000 to $20,000 a year on her household, herself, and her children. She trades in a Class A store.

Type B.—Mrs. B is the wife of an artisan earning from $12 to $25 a week. She has had only a limited education, reads slowly and with some difficulty, does her own housework, and has to make every dollar do the work of two or three. She is naturally on the lookout for bargains and is a fair type of customer of the Class B stores.

Type C.—Mrs. C is an "average" woman—the wife of a young lawyer or business man that earns from $1,500 to $15,000 a year. She has had a good common-school education, has active church or society interests, reads several of the magazines and at least one good paper, is a woman of taste and culture, and has a keen eye for style and quality in merchandise. She knows a bargain when she sees it and is always glad to see one, yet she is in a position to buy at "regular" prices when attracted by beauty or novelty. She deals a little in Class A stores and occasionally in Class B stores when the bargain inducement is strong and genuine, but most of her trade is in Class C stores. She is the woman whose custom has built up the largest and most profitable retail establishments of the United States.

25. Different Forms of Address.—Obviously, it will not be well to address types A, B, and C in the same way. Therefore, the advertising man should determine which woman best represents the class coming to his store and keep her constantly in mind. In some way, every man has knowledge of actual persons of these three types; and in appealing to his selected class of public, he should address them precisely as if he were addressing only one of these actual persons.

QUALITY ADVERTISING

26. Class A stores, making their appeal to women of whom Mrs. A is a type, put their entire force into the quality of merchandise. The reduced price is often not even mentioned except in times of "clearance," and is always made subordinate. The advertisements shown in Figs. 1, 2, and 3 are typical examples of quality advertising. When introductions, or "editorials," are used—which rarely happens—they are couched in formal and precise language. Strictly speaking, such advertisements as those shown in Figs. 1 and 3 do not represent advertisement writing at all.

They are merely carefully arranged and neatly set words, and can scarcely even be termed descriptions. The advertisements of stores of this class make little or no pretense to force business, as they are addressed to persons that are supposedly unaffected by the customary arguments of low prices.

This style of advertising is the easiest and least effective of all and seldom requires the services of an advertising man so far as its writing is concerned, but it does require very careful selection and description of merchandise. So far as concerns this Section, quality advertising may be dismissed with this reference, although the examples shown in Figs. 1, 2, and 3 should be studied as object lessons in the colorless and formal style often demanded by stores of this class.

BARGAIN ADVERTISING

27. Class B, or the bargain, style of advertising, represented by the advertisements shown in Figs. 4, 5, and 6, is still extremely common, although it is being gradually displaced by more conservative advertising. It will be noted in these examples that price is everything. Often, in such advertisements, not one item is mentioned at a regular price. The introductions, when there are any, are couched in highly colored language, redolent with superlatives. Everything is "best" or "biggest" or "lowest priced." The strongest display is given to price figures.

The so-called "better-class" stores affect to ridicule this style of advertising, but it cannot be dismissed with a sneer. These examples should be studied carefully, because there is no doubt whatever that the style is wonderfully effective with the class of women to whom it is addressed. It rests with the advertising man to determine whether this is the most effective style for his store and whether he can improve on it for his own use.

28. Advantages and Disadvantages of Bargain Advertising.—This bargain style is of course intended to reach women that can grasp figures more easily than words—to whom low prices mean more than anything else. It has the advantage in that it is “quick-result” advertising. Being based on specific offers of a specified lot of goods, usually for one day’s selling only, the results, if they come at all, come on the heels of the insertion of the advertisement. Results are usually large if the offers are genuine and if the statements made are written in an earnest, convincing style.

The bargain style has its disadvantages in that there is little continuity of result and no great business-building power. It concentrates attention on underpriced goods in which there is usually the smallest profit, and gives little foundation for the steady, matter-of-habit buying of unadvertised staples in which the best profits of a store are usually made. The clientele of such a store, being taught to expect bargains from it, remain interested in nothing but bargain offers.

29. Unprofitableness of Bargains.—The foregoing remarks bring up an extremely important point, which, while more strictly within the province of the merchandise man or the general manager, should receive careful attention from the advertising man, as the public representative and spokesman of the store.

It may be considered as a general rule that genuine bargain offers in themselves are not so profitable to the store making them as offers of regular-priced goods would be. There are exceptions, of course. For example, it frequently happens that the purchasing power of a large establishment will enable it to buy what is called a “job” of goods from some dealer or manufacturer at a price so low that the merchandise can be offered at prices far under the regular prices and still show the regular profit to the store. However, in honestly conducted and truthfully advertised stores, the bargain offer is more frequently made at a loss of a part of the usual profit; sometimes, at a loss of all the profit; and occasionally, but rarely, at an actual loss.

It is plain, therefore, that if a store advertises nothing but bargains and sells nothing but advertised goods, it will not do a profitable business, although it may be crowded with customers from morning until night. The advertising man must never forget that a busy store is not necessarily making money; this depends entirely on what the customers are buying. This fact is often overlooked even by department-store proprietors themselves until they are reminded by the sheriff that it is easier to draw a crowd than to make money out of it.

30. Bargains Used as Attractions Only.—The whole theory of bargain advertising, therefore, is to attract customers in order to sell them other goods than those advertised, on which a profit can be made. In a broad sense, bargain offers are best used to make the store popular. A constant hammering on the lower price is supposed to create a general impression on the public that everything in the store is cheaper than it can be had elsewhere. Thus, when a woman, especially of the type B, wants goods of any kind, she goes to the store that has a reputation for underpricing, no matter whether the goods are actually advertised that day or not; and it is on the regular sales so made that the store makes its profits.

31. Developing of Bargain Hunters.—The theory mentioned in the preceding article often works to perfection in practice. But where active competition exists, as for instance, when there are two or more Class B stores in the same town, each hammering away on the bargain principle, this style of advertising is likely to develop a class of so-called "bargain hunters"; that is, it will teach the public to wait until the goods actually desired are advertised at a bargain price. In such a case, the business will go to the store that advertises the strongest bargains and the greatest number. The rivalry thus developed is unfortunate for the stores, as none of them can spare the space nor the energy to push regular goods in their advertising. In order to make their profits, it is necessary either to exaggerate the values or to "switch" customers to regular-priced goods when they come in for the bargains.

To such an extent is "switching" carried on by stores that have long been addicted to the "nothing-but-bargains" advertising that some of them have a standing rule to the effect that a salesperson that makes a practice of selling to a customer the goods actually advertised will be dismissed. It is scarcely necessary to add that these stores are not doing a dignified nor an increasing business.

Bargain advertising of this kind must, in the long run, be disastrous to any store that practices it. Faced with this dilemma, the best store managers and the most successful advertising managers (for the two must work hand in hand) are those who can best combine the presentation of regular-priced goods with bargain attractions.

MIDDLE CLASS OF ADVERTISING

32. The happy medium between lifeless or dignified quality advertising and injurious bargain advertising is Class C, which may be called the middle, or common-sense, class. This method is the one that is followed today by the most successful stores, and it is these stores that are listed in this Section as Class C, or middle-class, establishments. Class C advertising, now produced by the most prominent and highest-salaried advertising men, is very rapidly displacing all other kinds, especially in the larger cities. While it is well to be prepared to produce any kind of advertising that is demanded of him, the ad-writer must be especially versed in the principles of Class C advertising. It is beyond doubt the most successful style, because it is based on good business principles, but it is infinitely more difficult than either the colorless Class A or the highly colored Class B style. Class C advertising requires in the advertiser a high degree of judgment, a thorough knowledge of human nature, and, in its best examples, much literary ability. However, all these essentials are possible to any one that will take the time to study and acquire them, and the rewards, as in the successful accomplishment of all difficult pursuits, are certain and adequate.

PREPARATION OF ADVERTISEMENTS

COLLECTION AND SELECTION OF MATERIAL

METHODS FOLLOWED BY ADVERTISING MEN

33. The question of advertising policy and style having been determined, the next important questions are what is to be advertised, how the material is to be found by the advertising manager, and what considerations shall govern his choice of matter, when choice is necessary.

34. Getting Copy From Buyers.—In ample time, before the advertisement is to appear—a time depending on circumstances, which will be discussed further on—the advertising manager must collect from the buyers the items that are to be featured. Usually, the buyers themselves will attend to this; sometimes, however, to the embarrassment of the advertising man. In all stores there are certain buyers that are keenly alive to the value of advertising. These men or women require no “prodding”; they will flood the advertising office with matter for publication, often to the exclusion of other departments, the buyers of which are not so eager nor so progressive. It is the duty of the advertising manager to regulate this matter so that all departments in need of advertising will get it.

35. Taking Care of Weaker Departments.—As a general rule, the stronger departments do not need so much advertising as the weaker ones, yet it is usually the strong departments that try to get the lion’s share, partly because they have more to talk about and partly because they are usually controlled by stronger and more aggressive buyers. The task before the advertising man is to build up the weaker departments without sacrificing any of the growth of the stronger ones, and it is one that requires skill and thought.

36. Merchandise as the Controlling Factor.—Advertising alone will not build up a department; it is the merchandise that really governs the situation. If a department is weak because it does not have the right goods, all the advertising in the world cannot help it much. This condition is one for the general management rather than for the advertising man, although the latter should never hesitate to do what he can toward criticism and improvement.

37. Advertising Man as a Critic of Merchandise. The most prominent advertising men today are those who combine with their advertising work a good knowledge of merchandise and a keen eye for detecting faults. The more the advertising man can, by criticism and suggestion, do toward improving the merchandise, the more valuable he is to the store. In all stores, he is given great rights and powers on these lines, provided he is competent to exercise them, and in many stores, he himself is the merchandise critic. If, then, a department is weak because of its merchandise, the advertising man should first of all try to secure improvement. If the merchandise is good and is worthy of being advertised, he should advertise it. If the buyer of a department does not come to the advertising man, the advertising man himself must go to that department and inject some energy into it.

38. Keeping Informed on Conditions.—Of course, the advertising man should keep thoroughly informed on what every department is doing. He should keep his finger, so to speak, on the pulse of the store as carefully as the manager himself does. In practice, however, it will usually be found that the manager will take care of this end of the task, and will either supply the advertising man with a list of the daily sales or will tell him from time to time what departments need pushing. It is with a thorough understanding of what each department is doing and ought to be doing that the advertising manager accepts his copy from the buyers and prepares to lay out his daily advertisements; sometimes, however, the system provides that this be done on specific instructions from the management.

39. Pushing of Sales.—The mere fact that the buyers should and usually do supply the advertising man with information does not relieve him from the duty of exercising independent action when circumstances require it. If, as has been stated, a buyer does not now and then come to the advertising office clamoring for publicity, the advertising man must, if the department needs publicity, go to the buyer and clamor for "leave to print."

40. "Slow" Goods.—It is the advertising man's duty to supply the inspiration and energy that the buyer may lack. In a certain department, for instance, there is a line of goods that does not sell. The advertising man may see the goods lingering beyond their time, or his attention may be called to them by the buyer or the merchandise man. It is the duty of the advertising manager to sell these goods, and at the full price if he can. In this case, there is no reason for advertising the goods except the desire to sell them; that is, there is no reason that will appeal to the reader. The advertising man must be prepared to meet such an emergency with selling suggestions that will either furnish an incentive to the public to come in and buy or at least furnish some good, or apparently good, reason for advertising them.

41. Methods of Getting Out Slow Goods.—It is, of course, impossible to supply suggestions that will cover the entire problem of disposing of slow goods, for no two cases are likely to be the same. Again, the advertiser must depend on his own wit and ingenuity, without some measure of which he cannot hope to succeed. Some examples may be given, however, as illustrations of the way this frequent emergency has been met.

A certain very "loud" pattern in ribbons did not sell. The advertising manager, being appealed to, suggested that the ribbon be made up into bows and placed on straw hats for children. The hats were then advertised and sold at a low price.

A store had a large quantity of low-priced silk in an "off" color—a rather brilliant blue. The bright color made it unsalable as a material for dresses or petticoats. In this case, the advertising manager suggested that the silk be transferred to the blanket department and made up into comfortables, which were then sold at a special price.

A New York store had a line of women's shoes that did not sell readily because they had unusually heavy soles. They might have sold in midwinter, but the advertising manager was asked to push them out in July. As it was the beginning of the vacation season, he advertised them as "Stout shoes for mountain climbing and country wear" and sold them in a week.

42. Lowered Price as a Selling Argument.—While such schemes as the foregoing are often valuable, and while the advertising man must suggest them when possible, the argument that is most direct and effective is unquestionably a lowered price. It is well to find some good excuse for lowering the price other than the unsalability of the goods, but if there really is no other reason, give that. Say frankly, "These goods were bought by us to sell at a dollar" (or whatever the original price was); "we thought them worth a dollar, and still think so, but apparently you do not agree with us. Very well, take them at 50 cents, but get here early if you want one."

COPY FURNISHED BY BUYERS

43. Kinds of Copy Furnished by Buyers.—In most cases, the buyer will supply selling talk for his department in some form or other. The copy received from the departments will vary in character, just as the temperaments or abilities of the buyers themselves vary. Some of the copy furnished will be very carefully studied out and cleverly written, and again some of it will be hastily and carelessly prepared. Occasionally, but not often, items will come up to the advertising office in a form that can go into the advertisements without changing a word. Other items will be outlined in a way that will leave even the most experienced advertising man in doubt as to what the buyer is talking about. The two examples that follow were selected from copy furnished to the advertising manager of a large New York store, and will serve to show both the best and the worst forms of copy that may be expected.

EXAMPLE 1.—Mr. Advertising Manager: — Please advertise on Tuesday night, for Wednesday's selling, a special lot of 200 women's coats that have just come in. They are in the receiving room now and you can look at them. All of them are heavy winter coats for every-day use in cold weather and are made of an all-wool cheviot in black and navy blue, with a warm interlining and a lining of Venetian serge that will last as long as the coat will. Silk sleeves, that slip on easily. Coats are 52 inches long; cut in a new and sensible double-breasted model; stylish and warm. A woman can wrap herself up in one of these and laugh at the weather. They are very prettily braided; really very handsome coats. We have been selling coats exactly like these for $18.50, but the maker needed money pretty bad and I got this lot at a third less than his regular price. We'll sell them at $12.50. Give me a good picture and big space. Good thing for business women and those who have to be out evenings.

JOHN JONES, Buyer

This memorandum is good copy; almost any one could construct a telling advertisement from such vivid and comprehensive details.

Now observe a memorandum from another buyer—one that has little or no idea of what is good advertisement copy.

EXAMPLE 2.—Women's suits in a new style, greatest value ever offered. Advertise them Tuesday for Wednesday at $20.

JOHN SMITH, Buyer

In the case of example 1, the advertising man need see the goods only to verify the buyer's claims for them (he should invariably examine the goods). In the case of example 2, no guidance at all is given; the advertising man must examine the suits himself and collect the facts that will make them sell.

44. Securing Data by Questioning the Buyers. The advertising man can collect his facts best by a sort of cross-examination of the buyer that fails to provide the proper data. In the case of the suits, for example, the advertising man should take up the separate pieces and, while examining them, he should ask the buyer questions about the cloth, the color, the style, the collar, the lining, the stiffening, the buttons, the plaits, the hem of the skirt, the workmanship, and various other features of the garments that will interest women. If the advertising man does not make it too apparent that he is searching for selling points, but asks questions and talks more as a shopper would, the buyer is more likely to give out the real information about the goods and tell why they can be offered at the exceptional prices.

If the advertising man finds that the price of the goods offered is very low he should learn just why the price has been cut. Are they going out of style? Are some of the sizes missing? Are they the entire output of a manufacturer, bought at a very low figure? Are they from the stock of a bankrupt former competitor? Whatever the exact reason is for the cut in price, the advertising manager must ascertain it.

If the buyer says the goods are especially fine, the advertising man must question him to find out just what constitutes the high quality.

45. Amount of Writing Done by Advertising Managers.—How much actual writing the advertising man will have to do depends on himself, the size and character of his staff, and the kind of copy his buyers furnish. Some department-store men have very little copy written by the buyers, preferring to have their own writers get information from the buyers and then do the actual writing themselves. Other department-store men follow the plan of letting buyers write just as much copy as they will; then they modify, add to, and improve this copy as much as possible. Still other advertising men follow both systems, assigning writers to the department of buyers that are not good at preparing advertising data.

Where the advertising man has no staff, he, of course, does a great deal of writing; where he has a very capable staff, he may content himself with writing introductions, preparing copy for the departments that are to be featured, and editing the entire advertising thoroughly, eliminating, adding, and improving.

Some men new in department-store work make the mistake of doing practically no writing, but use buyers' copy just as it is sent in. This practice is a confession of weakness.

FORMING THE ADVERTISEMENT

46. Making the Layout.—The advertising manager, having received from the buyers, or having collected of his own accord, the material for an advertisement, now approaches the task of putting the copy into type and before the public.

The first step, after the advertising man has locked himself in his office, is to take the collected material and go over it carefully. It will be necessary to decide what items deserve the largest spaces and the best positions; that is, the "feature" items, as they are called, will have to be selected. After this, it will be necessary to decide which items may be omitted altogether, as not worth advertising, or which ones may best be sacrificed in order to give room to matter of greater importance. The final task, before writing the advertisement, is to consider the arrangement of the various items into a well-balanced and composite whole; that is, to make a layout.

47. Giving Prominence to All Departments.—It must not be assumed that because some items are of less importance than others the ad-writer is justified in hiding them. As a matter of fact, careful attention must be given them in order to prevent them from being overshadowed by the features. It is the duty of the ad-writer to arrange the items so that any part of the whole advertisement will be instantly apparent to any one that may be looking for that line of goods, while the feature departments must fairly shriek for attention. To use an expression originating with a well-known New York advertising man, "the feature departments are made so that they must be seen, while the others are made so that they may easily be seen."

A great many buyers will insist on getting a position at the top of the advertisement, but the fact is that the position at the top is not essential to prominence if the layout is carefully made, as may be seen by referring to Fig. 11.

48. Importance of the Layout.—A good layout should give an attractive general effect and at the same time display each department in such a way as to make it easily seen. An arrangement like this is of more importance than may be imagined at first thought. A carefully arranged, well-displayed, department-store advertisement invites attention as a whole, while an advertisement carelessly laid out, with its items thrown together in a confused manner, is not only unattractive in its general effect but usually wasteful of space and weak in its display of the smaller items. This is clearly illustrated in the advertisements shown in Figs. 12, 13, and 14.

49. Proper Person to Make Layouts.—It is the practice of some department-store advertising men to send their copy to the printer with no instructions, or very little, as to layout and arrangement. This is a lazy and inefficient way, and is almost certain to produce unsatisfactory results. This important detail should always be taken care of by the advertising man.

50. Giving Prominence to Small Items.—In making a layout, as has been stated, the best plan is to give attention to the smaller items, as the "features" will usually be big enough to take care of themselves. Emphasis and prominence are given to these small items by the judicious use of position, paneling, white space, and display. A careful study of the various examples in this Section, particularly those shown in Figs. 15, 16, 17, and 18 will bring out this fact clearly.

You may accept their predecessors with which we founded our business as a criterion.

An Important Sale of Umbrellas FOR MEN AND WOMEN.

Its organization required much shrewdness and diplomacy. The result justified the effort. We have secured the entire product of a maker who is famed for the sturdiness of his umbrellas. The price concession was most generous. The superiority of material is self-evident. Also the good taste expressed in the handles. Here are the details—Best Paragon frames, steel rods, tight roll, handles of pearl, sterling silver, gold, royal copper, carved and smoked ivory, agate, gun metal, crystal and fancy woods in a variety of shapes and designs, including the new straight English club. Sizes 36 and 38 inch. They are divided into three lots, all of which include the above handles.

The New Millinery.

Our designers have just returned from Paris. They brought with them all the newest ideas of the far-famed Parisian masters. If you would see them most tastefully and cleverly expressed you need not pay our department a visit. You will find the most exquisite creations imaginable. They are designed for present wear. If they tempt you to ask the prices you will find them moderate.

Notions and Trimmings.

We have organized these two departments with a distinct purpose: to make them complete and replete with every requisite usually found within their precincts—and a few besides. Their chief claim to usefulness is greater than that, though. It's the dependable quality of everything which they offer. Whether the article be great or small, rest assured it is as good as you can find anywhere, even considered.

A strong, plain, and dignified setting, but rather "flat" in appearance. Nothing stands out as there is a forbidding solidity to it as a whole. A long headline and a good illustration would improve the appearance of this advertisement

51. Value of a Well-Arranged Layout.—While much emphasis has been laid on the importance of a carefully considered and well-arranged layout, it is nevertheless true that many well-advertised stores make no pretense whatever of planned action on this point, but print the items just as they happen to come. This method is good enough when it is intentionally meant to impress the public that all items are of equal importance, and it also works well enough in small advertisements—those of two columns or less—but there is no question whatever that when large space is used and emphasis is desired on features, or when it is desired to get the maximum amount of force in the minimum amount of space, a thoughtfully arranged layout is necessary, not only to give small items prominence but also to make the advertisement attractive to the eye.

52. Size of Layouts.—Large sheets of any kind of paper may be used in making up a layout. Some newspaper publishers make a practice of furnishing their department-store patrons with sheets just the size of the page of the newspaper. Proper balance for a department-store advertisement may be attained more easily if proofs of the cuts and a proof of the name plate are pasted on the layout. When this is done and all the salient features are indicated, as shown in Fig. 19, the layout is a rough full-sized picture of the finished advertisement. Fig. 20 shows the advertisement as it appears when set up. The examples shown in Figs. 19 and 20 are, of course, considerably reduced, Fig. 20 being reduced much smaller than Fig. 19. As the printers were familiar with the style of the store for introductory matter, descriptions, etc., it was unnecessary in the case of Fig. 19 to lay out small details of the display; a brief memorandum on each section of the copy was sufficient.

WRITING COPY FOR ADVERTISEMENTS

ESSENTIALS TO THE PREPARATION OF COPY

53. It will be clear from the foregoing, that, according to the best and most general practice, the hardest work of the advertising man is usually done before a line of copy is written. Of course, there is no objection to writing the advertisement first and arranging its details afterwards, if for any reason that method is more convenient, but it will be found in most cases that a better practice and one that saves much rewriting is to write last of all; that is, when a very clear picture of the exact shape and general characteristics of the finished advertisement is firmly fixed in the mind.

In treating of writing copy for department-store advertising, only Class C, or middle-class, advertising will be considered. This style is generally admitted to be the most effective; at least it is in the most demand and is always safe to follow.

54. In Figs. 7, 8, and 9 are shown examples of the best types of Class C, or middle-class, common-sense, copy. By noting these examples closely, it will be found that they are from stores that are recognized as the largest and most successful in the United States. This is no mere coincidence. These stores are the most successful because their policy, as reflected in their advertising, is based on common sense and good business principles. Their advertising is representative of the best, because it best represents and reflects the right policy.

As has been previously stated, there are degrees, even in Class C advertising. The advertisement shown in Fig. 8, for example, is intended to reach persons of somewhat higher culture than is the one shown in Fig. 7, yet these examples have important common characteristics. The first of these characteristics is a certain very noticeable and very important air of convincingness. It is almost impossible to read these advertisements without believing that the advertiser means what is said. This is the fundamental requirement of all successful advertising composition.

55. Fundamental Rule of Good Advertising.—An old saying states that "Truth is the mother of conviction." There is a law of psychology lying deep at the root of human nature that causes sincerity to be recognized instinctively whenever it is seen. No speaker or writer, however skilful or polished, that knows he is lying can impress himself on an audience as successfully as the plainest, most illiterate man that knows what he is talking about and believes absolutely in what he is saying. Of course, a skilful liar may deceive for a time, but he can only do so by imitating the characteristics of sincerity. Nevertheless, while a liar may be believed for a while, the sincere man that is sure of his facts is always believed. Nothing can stand against the arguments of the sincere man except a positive knowledge on the part of his hearers or readers that his statements are wrong—that he himself is deceived.

The first thing, therefore, necessary to the really successful advertising man is sincerity both with his readers and with himself. He must absolutely believe what he is telling them, and must say nothing and imply nothing that he has reason to doubt or that he does not absolutely know to be true. Thus fortified with knowledge and with earnestness, his advertisements will, entirely without other effort on his part, possess a conviction-carrying, business-bringing power that the cleverest writer of falsehoods can never successfully imitate. This, then, is the fundamental rule of good department-store advertising, and it cannot be considered too carefully.

56. Study of the Goods.—In Copy for Advertisements and Retail Management, the advertising man is urged to make a careful study of the goods to be advertised. It is not only important to know what the "talking points" are, but also to believe in them with that perfect all-around understanding that can come only from a personal study.

In department-store advertising, as mentioned previously, the buyers of the various departments ordinarily furnish the facts concerning their goods. While it is possible to construct a fairly good advertisement from such data without even seeing the goods or knowing anything about them, provided everything that the buyer says is believed, nevertheless it is astonishing with how much greater vigor, clearness, and convincingness the goods can be described after having verified their points by a personal inspection and study.

HEADLINES

57. The headlines of a department-store advertisement are even more important than those used in separate retail advertisements of other classes. A department-store advertisement is usually made up of a number of items, or departments, of varying size and shape, and these are massed together according to their relative importance, in such form as the judgment of the ad-writer suggests. It is of great importance that each of these items shall "stand out" by itself, so that the woman, for example, that is looking for bargains in millinery will see the millinery item, even if it is the smallest of twenty items grouped together, and even if she gives the composite advertisement the merest glance. Moreover, it is not only necessary that her attention shall be attracted, but it is important that it be gripped firmly, if possible, so that she will be impelled to read the item. All this must be done by the merest flash of the eye, and it is the headline, sometimes assisted by an illustration, that must do it. The importance of the headline in department-store advertising will therefore be understood. Great care should be given it. Many good advertising men confess that they spend more time in writing their headlines than they do on all the rest of the advertisement.

58. The ideal headline should either tell the whole story in itself, or should so awake the interest and excite the curiosity that the reader will read what follows. Of the two, the headline that tells the story is decidedly the better and the safer to use in department-store advertisements, because it has the advantage of making a definite impression. Observe the following examples:

A $40 Brass Bedstead for $25
Men's Suits for Less than Maker's Cost
The Fall Millinery Display Is Ready
Exceptional Bargains in Low Shoes

If no more than the headline is read in these cases, an impression will be made that may bring a customer. The style first given is perhaps the most common and most useful in all department-store work. Except that it is easily overworked, it is perhaps the best kind of headline that can be written, because it really leaves very little besides minor details of "why" and "what kind" to be told.

The following are so-called "curiosity-arousing" headlines:

Men, what do you think of this offer?
If you miss this, you'll miss a bargain
The greatest piece of news we have printed in years

Headlines of this class, while often used by good writers, especially to draw attention to long advertisements containing too many points to be condensed into a single line, had better be avoided when possible. A little study will usually give the writer a form that will have the same interest-arousing power and at the same time possess the impression-making power.

59. In writing headlines for department-store advertisements, it is advisable (1) to bring in the name of the goods and, if possible, a selling point; and (2) to bring in the price when the price is a feature. In this connection, the headlines in the advertisements reproduced in this Section should be studied. Of course, it will be understood that all the headlines are not perfect examples, but they will permit the beginner to decide for himself which can be improved. The instruction relating to headings in Copy for Advertisements, Part 1, should also be reviewed.

INTRODUCTIONS

60. In a number of the examples shown, it will be noticed that the descriptions of the goods are prefaced by introductions. The greatest skill of the writer is called on for the proper construction of these. When introductions contain something of real interest and are well written, they are undoubtedly of service, but there is no doubt that many of them could be omitted without injury to the advertisement—some of them to the improvement of the advertisement. In the advertisements of many stores they are not used at all. The long general introduction that was so common a dozen years ago, is now rarely seen.

In writing introductions, it will be well to bear in mind the advice of the old lawyer to the young lawyer: "When you have to address a jury or a meeting," said he, "first, be sure you have something to say; second, say it; third, sit down." Thus, if the ad-writer wishes to preface the descriptions of goods with introductions, he should be sure, first, that he has something to say that will do some good. If he has that, he should say it as clearly and forcibly as possible, and stop.

In connection with the study of department-store introductions, it is well to review the instruction relative to introductions in Copy for Advertisements, Part 1.

61. Cut Price as Subject of Introduction.—If the item happens to be, as it most frequently is, one that is offered at a special price, there can be no better subject for an introduction than an explanation of why the price is lowered. Many good advertisers make it a rule never to announce a lowered price, that is, never to announce a bargain, without telling why it was possible to make the offer. This adds to the convincingness of the advertisement. Everybody knows that a store must make a profit on the goods it sells, and many stores try to create the distinct impression that their profits are made as small as good business policy will permit.

Theoretically, a store is permitted to reduce a regular price only because of (1) some reason that enables it to buy goods cheaper than usual, or (2) some reason that justifies it in reducing its profit below the level of good business policy. Otherwise, the reader might wonder why more than the special price should ever have to be paid. Consequently, it is wise to explain the causes that led to the offer. This explanation not only adds to the convincingness of the advertisement, but it avoids leaving the possible impression that the regular price is too high. Examples of such explanations are given in the advertisements shown in Figs. 21, 22, and 23. These are only sections of large advertisements, which fact accounts for the omission of signature and address.

62. Other Subjects for Introductions.—When the article is not offered at a special price, the introduction should set forth the reason for giving space to advertising it. This may be any one of many things, the most common being its seasonableness, as in the advertisement shown in Fig. 24. Other reasons include beauty, novelty, large assortment, shopworn goods, etc. (See Figs. 25, 26, and 27; also, Art. 40.) In any case, there should be some reason in the advertising man's mind for giving space to an item and it is usually wise to mention it. If there is no such reason to give the public, the advertising man may well ask himself, "Why should I print the item at all?" The ability of a department-store advertiser is often demonstrated as clearly in the items he does not print, as in the manner in which he describes those which he does print.

DESCRIPTIONS

63. In order to describe goods, it is necessary to know them thoroughly. This cannot be emphasized too often nor too forcibly. The writer must not only know the good points of the goods, but he must be fully acquainted with the reasons why they are good. Not every person, for

Here's the Big Mid-Summer Clearance in the Misses' and Children's Wear Store!

TWICE a year we do this, February and August. They are famous events because when it comes to making prices in these clearance movements we have no discrimination, no reservations and no mercy on ourselves.

We simply shut our eyes and slash.

The result is that we get through, in three or four tremendous days, a process which most stores drag out for weeks. Then we are "cleaned up" and ready for any tempting lots that manufacturers may be willing to sacrifice later on, and ready, too, for the first choice picking of new season's productions.

Those are the reasons—here are the results:

Dix Make House Dresses and Wash Suits $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{3}$ Less Than Regular Prices

We have purchased for this sale the surplus stock of the well-known Dix Make Two-Piece Suits and House Dresses, consisting of 1,269 garments.

The Dix Make garments are well known for their perfect finish and the general high-class character of the workmanship, deep hems, full skirts, correct fitting, refined styles, and "never-rip" seams.

Last January we had a sale of these dresses and it was one of the notable successes of the year. We have nearly 500 more dresses in this sale than last year.

Special Price Invitations to Lovers of Fine Paintings

The new prices present an opportunity for the enrichment of local collections—in some cases the prices having been cut 50 per cent.

For instance, The Latest Romance, by C. Haight Wood, a member of the Royal Academy and one of the best English artists, was priced Saturday at $400. To-day it is marked $200.

Other reductions average a third or more.

The pictures were gathered abroad by our own collectors, and the original prices were much lower than they would have been did we buy through third parties.

These Slushy Days Have No Terrors for Women Who Wear the "Czarina" High-Cut Boots.

The high-cut boot has been popular all the Fall because it was a proper and sensible style in foot-wear to accompany the reign of the short skirt.

Now that Winter is full upon us and the streets full alternately of wet snow and wetter slush, this popular style is even more popular, for it is the dryest and the healthiest boot that a woman can wear for such walking.

The fine, grain leather of the vamp, the tough, elastic calfskin of the uppers and the flexible, but stout soles are as nearly waterproof as leather can be. And the high top keeps the ankles and lower leg perfectly dry, even against the flapping of a wet skirt.

Dainty Slippers for the Ball Room

Ever since the days of Cinderella, more attention has been given to a dainty dress for the foot. Up to that time they had evidently been considered a means to an end—for comfort and to keep the feet warm.

That episode showed the possibilities in a mere slipper.

Whether this be true or not, never has the question of beautiful slippers been given more consideration than at present.

If the slippers do not match the gown, the gown must match the slippers.

It is impossible to tell in cold type of our display of handsome slippers.

For instance, handsome bronze slippers, with beaded tongue, are appropriate for gowns in delicate colors.

Then the gold slippers can be worn with any dainty costumes.

The correct shade of red is found in imported morocco.

Slippers in pink, blue, and white glaze, with Louis heels, or the brown, gray, and black ooze are all in demand.

Patent leather is always en règle. We have the covered box Cuban heel if you prefer it to the Louis.

Ball-room slippers start at $2.50. You'll have to see them to judge their beauty.

See the Toilet slippers, too. They start at 50c for the Turkish.

Women's Calf Shoes at $2.65; value $3.50

Belts From All Over Europe

Opening Day and an Innovation

The unusual. That's the keynote that gives distinction and interest to the Opening. If you knew the conjuring and the travel back of this display, you would not wonder at the immense variety or the unique beauty. In quest of pretty belts all Europe is searched. Many of the designs are original with us, created by foreign makers at our dictation and suggestion. As illustration there's an artistic jewelry store on the Boulevard Poissonniere in Paris. The window shows a unique exhibit of empire jewelry.

The manager of the belt store, hungry for ideas, passed by. A little pin in the exhibit caught his eye. He carried it to the belt maker, and that pin became motif for one of the most artistic buckles in the display. And that planning is typical of the creation of scores of others. No wonder that stores, everywhere, the biggest and best of them, have marveled at this Belt Store. There isn't one in the world to match it. The opening is of widespread interest.

As to fashion. The tendency is to straight-around effects. Belts vary in width from 2½ to 6 inches. Elastic belts are winning new laurels. They are the fashion without a doubt. All colors, some of velvet. Some embossed like a bit of brocade. Prices run from 50c to $25. Imagine the variety! Japanese designs and colorings are a strong note. Stamped leather belts are new. These come from France, Austria, and Germany.

Mourning belts are a feature of the Opening. Refined, beautiful effects.

Innovation—Belts Made to Order

We've the beltings in solid or two-tone effects; buckles to blend with colorings. Both exclusive with us—gathered in Vienna, in fact. Select your belting and the buckle that pleases you. We'll make exactly to your size. Prices are fair, very. See this feature in the opening. See the belts, hundreds of them. Enjoy it all to your heart's content. It is meant to be of large practical help to you, to women everywhere.

These Bargains Are Tempting Refreshments

The introductory sentences of this advertisement bring out the idea of special price, because the trunks are samples and odd ones and the bags are slightly soiled and worn example, may know why a "hand-molded collar" is a point of importance in a man's coat. But if the writer describes "hand-molded collars that keep their shape and never sag away from the neck or crinkle across the lapels," the point is made perfectly clear.

To know the goods they must be studied. This is another point that should receive careful attention, because, in spite of the fact that it is a principle that all will agree is sound, hundreds of so-called ad-writers do not live up to it.

The writer must study the public at the same time he studies the goods. He must ask himself at the beginning, What would a prospective customer wish to know about these goods? What questions would a salesman be asked about them? On what points would a customer satisfy himself by personal inspection, if he came to the store to buy the goods?

The advertising man should endeavor to answer these questions before he writes a line. In most cases, the buyer of the department concerned can supply the information. It is a very good plan for the advertising man to make a practice of questioning salespeople on these points. They can tell what seems to please customers and what does not, the questions that customers ask, etc. A great deal can be learned, too, by standing near a busy counter and listening to the questions and remarks of customers.

64. It is practically impossible to give even the principal selling points of goods that department stores carry, owing to the enormous field they cover. Besides, the important features change rapidly, especially the styles and colors. Knowledge of these lines comes first from the exercise of common sense and careful study, and, secondly, from the ability to pick up, classify, and remember scraps of information dropped casually in conversations with buyers, salespeople, and customers, or accidentally run across in reading. Trade journals afford much information of value in this line.

65. Selection of Facts.—In the writing of descriptions, the department-store writer may be compared to a reporter on a newspaper (in some stores the writers are called reporters). He must not only have the "news instinct," which tells him what will and what will not make interesting matter for his readers, but he must also be able to pick out from a mass of facts those which will make a good story and then weave his description around them, omitting nothing of value and wasting no space on unimportant points.

GENERAL SUGGESTIONS

66. As has already been stated, it is almost impossible to give any schedule of selling points that will be of much value, because they vary with every article and with every change of season and change of style. However, the following will serve for general guidance: In considering articles in which design and style are important features, their style and design should be described. Staple articles in which style is of slight importance, such as knit underwear, hosiery, blankets, toweling, etc., are more difficult to describe. The selling points in such cases, aside from price, are points of quality, such as the size and weight of the blankets, the width of towels, the fineness of knitting, and the character of the dye used in the hosiery, etc.

67. Price Alone Often Meaningless.—In advertisements of such goods as just mentioned, price in itself means nothing unless it is coupled with a description of the goods. It is obviously unconvincing to speak of "great values in stockings at 15 cents a pair," because any dealer might offer some kind of hosiery at that price. However, if the writer describes them as "fine, lisle stockings, in the genuine Hermsdorf black, at 15 cents," he will have a crowd at the store the next day, because every woman knows that such stockings, if perfect, usually cost at least 25 cents a pair. This point has already been mentioned and seems too obvious to need repeating, yet it is astonishing how often it is disregarded by advertising writers. Care should therefore be taken never to omit the essential details that make the price quotation mean something. There is no rule more important than this. If such details cannot well be given, or if they are too technical for the ordinary reader's understanding, at least the price for which the article usually sells should be quoted.

68. Value of Describing Style.—By far the greatest number of items written by the department-store writer depend on the question of style for their interest; and style must usually, but not always, be treated in conjunction with descriptions of the quality of goods or with illustrations. Thus, in advertising women's tailored suits or men's clothing, it is essential to the best results that a picture be used, or that a verbal description that shall amount to a picture be given. The thoroughness and cleverness with which this word picture is drawn may make the great difference between good results and no results. Many advertisements merely assert quality, but here and there an advertisement is found like that shown in Fig. 28, which tells why the quality is good.

69. Advisability of Avoiding Generalities.—The less an ad-writer deals in generalities, such as "first-class fabrics," "up-to-date styles," "well-tailored," and other hard-worked phrases, and the closer he keeps to bona-fide descriptions, the better his advertisements will "pull." In fact, such phrases serve to make a distinction between mediocre advertising and good advertising.

70. Truthfulness in Advertising.—It will be apparent at once that in order to write close and accurate descriptions of style and quality, so as to include the points that make the price mean something, the ad-writer should either know all about merchandise or have somebody at his elbow that can tell him the points. Fortunately, the department-store writer has always an inexhaustible source of information in the buyer. But the buyer's statements often need careful verification. He is not likely to be underenthusiastic, and as his own success often depends on his success in impressing the advertising man, he is likely to say more than the facts will warrant.

The buyer may perhaps be pardoned, though never justified, for enthusiastic exaggeration, but it is a fault that can never be forgiven the advertising man. Modern advertising demands accuracy and truth; the time is past—if, indeed, it ever existed—when “the public liked to be humbugged,” and it is the duty of the advertising man to protect his store against errors of this kind. One exaggeration may do more harm to a store than a month’s advertising can make good. The ad-writer should, of course, portray the offers as alluringly as he can, but he must stick to facts if he wants to succeed.

No successful store practices exaggeration today; the stores that do exaggerate are not increasing their business, and the ones that are notorious for exaggerating are losing ground daily.

71. Verification of Buyers’ Claims.—In most of the large stores, the advertising man usually insists on examining goods even when he knows all about them and does not have to examine them to find out the selling points. He does this to make sure that the buyer is not deceiving him. In some stores, this duty of checking off buyers’ statements is performed by the merchandise man. In at least two very prominent stores, a reward of $1 or more is paid to anybody in the organization that can detect an error or overstatement in the advertising, and with four or five thousand pair of eyes scanning his work, the advertising man has to be careful, for he is always held strictly accountable. It is not an excuse to say that he relied on the buyer’s statement; the buyer is not the mouthpiece of the store, while the advertising man is.

72. Frankness in Advertising.—To summarize the foregoing points, it is well in writing descriptions never to omit to state the points that make the price significant; that is, the points of weight, width, character, workmanship, novelty, or style that give the article its value. These points should be made as vivid and alluring as possible and at the same time should be kept within the limits of truth. Never fail to state anything that is wrong with the goods, such as dropped stitches, oil stains, slight soiling, etc.

A story is told about a well-known pioneer advertising manager. On the very first morning in his new position, he was approached by a buyer that said: "We want to offer two hundred mackintoshes tomorrow. They were bought to sell at $20, but they're rotten."

This information was cheering, to be sure.

"Oh, we'll do well if we can get $5 for them, but I fear the case is rather hopeless."

Fig. 29 shows the substance of what appeared in the advertisement.

It is said that the two hundred were sold in a few hours, and that many persons were turned away disappointed.

It is never a mistake to be frank with the public, as the customer is sure to find out about defects anyway. If the ad-writer does not mention them, he has not only given a false impression, but he is sure to be caught. However, none of these facts should be taken on faith. The good and the bad alike should be verified.

A large New York store once advertised for the return of a lot of serge suits advertised and sold under a misapprehension of the quality. It cost the store money to do this, but the action undoubtedly did much toward creating public confidence.

In many of the large department stores where honesty is the oil that lubricates the wheel of advertising, a merchandise room is situated near the office of the advertising manager.

In this room, the advertising manager inspects all goods to be advertised, and if, in his opinion, the department buyer's statement of value is exaggerated, a consultation between the two ensues, and the matter is adjusted.

73. Advertising Small Quantities.—The department-store man should exercise care in the advertising of small quantities. If the amount of goods on hand is so limited that there is a probability that they will be sold before the day is over, this fact should be mentioned in the advertisement. It not only adds something to the convincingness of the advertisement and gives a good reason for the lowered price, if any, but it also avoids a very common cause of complaint on the part of customers that come late and find the goods gone. Such disappointed persons will not be likely to come the next time good things are advertised. If frank warning is given, however, they cannot blame the store for their disappointment.

WOMEN AS AD-WRITERS

74. Some of the most successful department-store advertising managers have one or more women ad-writers on their staffs. In writing up such goods as millinery, dress goods, notions, etc., a bright woman has a distinct advantage over a man. Sometimes a bright saleswoman can render valuable assistance even if her entire time is not given to advertising work.

DEPARTMENT-STORE MANAGEMENT

(PART 2)

GIVING PUBLICITY TO ADVERTISING MATTER

TYPOGRAPHICAL STYLE

1. On examining the newspaper advertisements of prominent department stores, or the examples shown in this Section, it will be found that nearly every large store has a distinctive typographical style. By continually following one style, the advertisements of each of these stores become so familiar to readers that the signature, or name plate, is frequently unnecessary, although, of course, it is never intentionally omitted. This style is usually brought about by setting the advertisements in all the newspapers in which they appear in a certain style of type. The type may be the property of the store, or the newspapers may own it and agree to use it only in the advertisements of a certain store. Therefore, if a store does enough advertising to warrant the purchase of a certain series of type for its exclusive use, an early duty of the advertising man should be to select an appropriate style and induce the newspaper publishers on his list or the proprietor of the store to purchase the type desired.

NOTE.—The subject of typographical style is treated in detail in Advertisement Display, which should be reviewed in connection with this Section.

Copyrighted by International Textbook Company. Entered at Stationers' Hall, London

2. Having chosen the type or having had it chosen for him, the advertising man should think out for himself the style of display in which it shall be used. This is a matter for individual taste and judgment, which should be governed by a study of the best examples of newspaper advertising procurable. The aim should be to make one's own advertisement strikingly different from all others likely to appear in the same paper and at the same time be reasonably economical in the use of space, and to strive always for simplicity and legibility as well as for individuality.

No rule can be given for the formation of a typographical style any more than a set rule can be given for the design of a house. It depends entirely on the judgment of the advertiser. But once a style is formed, it should be fairly well adhered to. Occasional variations do no harm; in fact, they are sometimes advisable to avoid the danger of losing effectiveness through too great uniformity. But these variations should be only occasional and only in points of detail.

ILLUSTRATIONS

3. Classes of Illustrations.—In department-store work, illustrations are of three general classes, namely, fashion work, which consists of representations of styles in dress; direct work, which usually includes drawings of actual articles, like furniture, pianos, refrigerators, and house furnishings; and decorative work, which covers purely decorative drawings, such as headings. Illustrations of the first two classes are used to make sales by showing a style or an article, while decorative illustrations are used merely to give an attractive appearance to an advertisement. Many good advertising men that use illustrations of the first two classes freely, never use those of the last class at all.

4. High-Grade Fashion Work.—The fashion work used in the best department-store advertising is rapidly attaining a very high plane of artistic as well as commercial merit. In Figs. 1, 2, and 3 are shown examples of high-grade fashion work, in which details are accurately brought out and well-fitting garments are illustrated. These illustrations should be contrasted with the one shown in Fig. 4, which, while artistic in conception and execution, is not good from a merchandizing point of view, because the suit appears to be baggy, ill-fitting, and untrimmed.

Good fashion artists are not plentiful. Their services command a high figure, and unless the advertising manager is fortunate enough to secure the services of a really first-class artist, he will do well to have his name placed on the mailing list of one of the many good commercial-art firms that syndicate their drawings.

The principal argument in favor of a syndicate service is the low cost. The pictures furnished, however, seldom or never portray the actual goods advertised. The cuts, therefore, are rather more decorative than purely illustrative. For this reason, the larger stores usually engage artists to come to the advertising office from time to time so as to make accurate drawings of the actual merchandise. One large New York store has its own staff of artists regularly employed the year around as a part of the advertising-department organization. This method is being followed to some extent by other prominent stores. It is costly, but it probably pays, because it gives the illustrations of the store an individuality; also, because it enables the advertising manager to plan and regulate the illustrating work much better. In this connection, the illustrations shown in Figs. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 should be carefully studied.

COPY AND PROOFS

5. Methods of Supplying Copy.—After the copy and the layout have been prepared, they are sent, together with the cuts, to the newspaper office. In some of the larger cities, it is the practice to give each paper a different advertisement, which plan, of course, requires a separate layout and separate copy for each.

In most cities, however, the advertising man prepares only one advertisement a day, and this is duplicated in whole

ST. LOUIS' GREATEST HOUSEFURNISHERS.

Providers of Reliable Furniture, Carpets and Household Goods.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The spirit of Spring! To-morrow we open wide our doors to welcome the beautiful new season and the busy buyers it will bring. The season may have caught the spirit of this most glorious time of year and is about to build up again. There is an added touch of warmth and freshness to the stock and appointments. Every article is, as if on dress parade, shining and gleaming and shining and bright.

Call and get ideas for better-looking home. All are most cordially welcome.

Our buyers, with a master in his department, were sent to the markets throughout the country. As a result our stock now holds a greater collection of more beautiful housefurnishings than has ever been shown in this city. In their search they found many bargains—these are now at your service.

Furniture, Carpets, Stoves and Ranges, in fact household necessities of every description and at every price, no matter how low or how trifling in cost, are here for your consideration and are shown in a most pleasing and up-to-date way.

Our standard of merchandise begins where most men and women with the best. You may select whatever you require, feeling confident in the knowledge that you are buying from a most complete stock, many patterns of which are made exclusively for us and not to be found elsewhere.

The prices you will invariably find to be right, lower than are asked for equal quality elsewhere. We aim to provide smart bargains, something different, something better than the old-style store and always at the lowest price.

Our reputation is built upon the fact—our Highest Quality, Neatest Style, Lowest Price and Best Service. Long ago we drew the line against the purely made goods that cannot stand the test of satisfactory work. Our goods are made to last. Quality is always first with us, then style and price that will bring to the home an air of taste and refinement.

The leading furniture business of St. Louis did not come to us by accident. Those who know the quality of goods we handle and the prices we sell them at will readily understand. Do you realize that our store is to-day almost double its size and volume of business what it was three years ago? The same factors which have caused it to grow so rapidly in the past stand out more prominently now than ever before. The women are scarce who will select anything in housefurnishings without first looking at Sommers.

We have aimed to establish every other furniture store as an example of service, generosity of store management and absolute correctness of style and price. We have chosen only the best of everything, even in the clerks who will attend to your needs, and if we have not yet reached the ideal store we will not relax our efforts but will ever strive for a higher standard of service for our patrons.

This reputation has brought to us the patronage not only of St. Louis but of the Central West, particularly of the State of the Louisiana Purchase tract, of which this city is the central center. Our store is in the heart of the shopping district and visitors to our great World's Fair will have no difficulty to find us.

We are pushing ahead because the people like our progressive way of doing business. We are doing our best, and our best is getting better every day. It is better than it was a year ago, it is much better than it was five years ago, it shall be better than spring than ever before. The store is going ahead in service as well as business. These two must go together.

We are a big crowd of our store and the way we have gained high positions in low prices and our hearty thanks go out to all those who have assisted us in building up a successful business in these lines.

We respectfully ask a continuance of your valued patronage.

A very pretty Easter advertisement. Illustrations, type, and display are all harmonious or in part by several papers. In this case, it is the easier plan to have one newspaper set the entire advertisement and furnish proofs of it the day before it is to appear. This method, of course, necessitates the writing and sending of copy two days before the day of publication, but nothing is lost by it, as it permits carefully considered and finished work. If emergencies arise that require quicker action, they can be met as they come, but the largest and most aggressive stores find the plan of sending in copy two days before publication quick enough.

Some stores set up their advertisements in their own typesetting office and furnish copy to newspapers in the form of a complete and corrected proof, which the newspapers copy letter for letter and line for line. This method really saves no time and is an item of much expense; it is a practice that is rapidly disappearing, however.

6. Individual Typesetting.—To facilitate the setting of copy, the best newspapers usually assign certain compositors to the advertisements of certain stores. These compositors, knowing the style of the borders and heads, the sizes of body for introductions, and the arrangement of panels, items, etc., can handle the work much more easily and accurately. It is well to suggest this plan to newspapers not already following it.

7. "Wait-Order" Copy.—In general practice, an advertisement intended, for example, for Wednesday's papers is prepared by the advertising man on Monday. The copy and layout, marked "wait orders," are then sent to one paper on the afternoon of the same day. This wait-order copy, as it is called in advertising offices, is immediately set in type and ten or more proofs are sent to the advertising man on the following morning (in this case, Tuesday morning), but the newspaper does not publish the advertisement until orders are given to do so.

Fig. 12 shows a schedule that is useful as a reminder to all who have to do with the preparing of the advertisement.

8. Getting Proofs Approved by Buyers.—As soon as the proofs are received by the advertising man, they are cut up into as many sets as there are newspapers to be used, plus one more set for the buyers, and each department clipping is pasted on a large sheet of paper.

While the rule of not cutting official proofs apart is a good general one to follow, it is best to make an exception in the case of department-store advertisements. This is a class of copy that is often written and set up with little spare time, which increases the number of corrections to be made. If an attempt is made to put fifty or sixty corrections or additions on the margin of a proof of a large advertisement consisting of many panels, the result will be a confusing maze of lines and words. By putting each section of the advertisement on a large sheet and allowing ample margins, plenty of room will be had for marking corrections. Besides, when this cut-apart proof goes back to the printing office, it may be divided among a dozen or more compositors so that changes can be made more quickly. As the printers already have a layout, no difficulty is experienced in finding the various sections of the set matter.

The advertising office, after cutting up the proofs as described, will have a number of duplicate sets of sheets of a uniform size, each sheet in each set representing one department. Let it be supposed that there are three newspapers to be used. This means, then, that four sets of these proofs will be needed. One set is then distributed among the departments, each buyer getting the sheet that has the advertisement concerning his goods, and the other sets are retained in the advertising department.

Each buyer reads the proof he receives and makes any correction necessary, especially in the advertised prices. When the proof is corrected, the buyer puts his O. K. on the sheet and returns it to the advertising office. The advertising man is thus relieved from all responsibility as to figures and technical statements, although he is of course not released from the duty of scanning the proof with extreme care in search of any mistake that the buyer may have overlooked.

9. Handling of Corrected Proofs.—Each corrected proof returned O. K. by the buyer is pinned to its duplicates, which were retained in the advertising office. When all the approved proofs from the various departments have been received, the advertising manager, or his proof-reader, if he has one, goes over them carefully for errors and possibilities of improvement. When the advertising man has finished, these proofs contain all the corrections, both those of the buyer and those of the advertising office.

10. Transferring of Corrections.—All corrections on the first set of proofs are then transferred to the duplicate proofs—one for each paper to be used. On each of these duplicates are also made such corrections and alterations as may be necessitated by any special rules or conditions peculiar to the paper to which it is to be sent.

The transferring of corrections to two or three sets of proofs is sometimes a matter of much toil when advertisements are large. When circumstances permit, this labor may be avoided by furnishing one complete corrected proof to the newspaper that set the advertisement and having that paper make the corrections in the type and furnish the other newspapers with revised proof. This method works very well in some cities and with newspapers that do not carry a large volume of advertising; in other cases, however, it is not feasible, owing to the late hour at which corrected copy is likely to reach the other newspapers.

11. Delivering the Proofs to Newspapers.—In the case under consideration, all the work of reading and approving the proofs is done on Tuesday. On Tuesday afternoon, the advertiser has a complete set of approved proofs from the buyers, and a number of duplicate sets of proofs that show both the buyer's and the advertiser's corrections. These approved proofs are retained and put on file, and the duplicates are sent to the newspapers with an order for insertion.

As the proof has been cut up to facilitate the mailing of corrections, a layout should be sent along with the proof to the newspapers that did not set the advertisement, so that they can see the arrangement of the various sections. In such cases, as the matter is in proof and the display is clearly shown, a rough layout will do.

It is more satisfactory for the store to have its own messenger service than to depend on messengers from the newspaper office.

12. With the proof and the order to insert sent on Tuesday afternoon for Wednesday's publication is also sent the wait-order copy for Thursday's advertisement. This process is repeated every day except Saturday, which is usually the "easy day" of the advertising manager's week. This day is therefore devoted to booklet writing and many other duties that await opportunity for completion.

In the foregoing outline of the customary method of supplying copy and handling proofs, no distinction is made between morning and evening newspapers so far as time of sending copy is concerned. In most cities, the first editions of the evening papers appear so early in the day that copy must be sent to them on the preceding evening, precisely as with the morning papers.

13. Using Matrices of Forms and Cuts.—In some cities, the newspapers have mutual agreements whereby one provides the others with matrices of all the advertisements that are to appear in the same style and size in each of the papers. In nearly all cities, it is customary for one paper to supply the others with matrices of the cuts used. In such cases, it is necessary for the advertising man to correct only one set of proofs; but, as a rule, he must send each paper its own layout and corrected proofs.

14. Necessity of Reading Proofs Carefully.—In the larger cities, as has been stated previously, the advertising man must usually send each of four or five newspapers separate wait-order copy; in return, he receives as many different proofs, all of which must go through the same process of cutting up, distribution to buyers, approving, correcting, and sending back with the order to insert.

This complex system, which is often made toilsome and difficult by the indifference or delay of buyers, sometimes tempts inexperienced department-store advertising men to "take chances" and insert advertisements that have not been seen in proof at all. Occasionally this is necessary in cases of emergency, but it is a practice that should be avoided if possible. If mistakes occur—and they occur frequently—they are likely to be costly. Careful revision by both buyer and advertising man is not only advisable, but actually essential to the protection of both employe and employer.

REINFORCING THE ADVERTISING

15. The whole duty of the efficient advertising man is not completed with the appearance of the advertisement in the newspapers. In all but the largest stores, it is also his duty to look after many other details, which will be briefly outlined.

16. Informing the Salespeople.—The advertising man must see to it that the effect of the advertisement is not lost through ignorance or inattention of salespeople. It would not be well for him nor for the store if a customer asked a salesgirl for an article advertised at a certain price that day and found her in total ignorance of what was meant or where to find it. It is, of course, the direct duty of the buyer and the indirect duty of the floor managers to see that the advertised goods are ready and properly marked on the morning of the day of sale, and that all the salespeople are fully informed of the fact and the terms of the advertised offer, but the efficient advertising manager will assure himself that all this has been attended to.

17. Furnishing Copy of Advertisement to Salespeople.—It is the practice in most stores to furnish the salespeople in each department with a copy of the day's advertisement and to see that they read it. This is usually done by the advertising office, acting through the floor managers, and is best accomplished by distributing proofs of the advertisements when the paper does not come out in advance of the sale, or by distributing copies of the newspaper when the sale goes into effect on the day after the advertisement appears.

18. Window Displays.—The show windows of a store are usually under the charge of the advertising manager, who works through a professional window trimmer. In all cases of important sales, the window display should cooperate with the advertisement.

The window displays are extremely important adjuncts to the department store's newspaper advertising. In fact, when the window is on a busy street, the display sometimes gives results that are equal to any that can be expected of an average newspaper. Careful attention should be given the windows in order that their showings may be attractive and timely; and they should be changed frequently, say as often as twice a week.

Window trimming is a profession in itself and requires great taste and judgment. The advertising man will do well to work in harmony with the window trimmer. If the latter is a competent man, it is better not to interfere with him. He should be told what department is to receive the window space, and the rest should be left to his knowledge and experience.

19. Show-Cards and Price Tickets.—A show-card writer is always a part of the advertising man's organization, and the writing of show-cards is no unimportant part of the advertising man's work. In displaying these cards, an effort should be made to get the best possible compromise between the extremes of putting a card on everything and of putting out no cards at all. Show-cards are "silent salesmen." They attract attention and carry selling arguments just as a newspaper advertisement does. They are powerful auxiliaries in the campaign of selling goods. But if there are too many of them, the eye of an observer becomes confused and weary and they lose their value. Too many cards should not be used, nor should they be made too large, but care should be taken with the ones that are prepared. They should be made to tell their story tersely and forcibly, and, most important of all, attractively. Just what form of attraction is to be used depends on the character of the store and the class of customers that frequent it. In a "popular" store, the attraction may be large letters and huge price figures; in a store of the so-called "better class," it might be dainty lettering or clever wording. It is a safe rule to treat show-cards as if they were headlines to an advertisement. The same principles underlie the use of both.

USE OF BOOKLETS AND FOLDERS

20. At one time it was the practice in all well-advertised stores to insert in every package that was wrapped and delivered, some circular, folder, or booklet advertising other goods. The argument in favor of this practice was (and is) that a large circulation of advertising matter could thus be secured at no cost but that of printing.

Of late years this practice has dwindled to a very great extent, especially in the larger cities, and the most experienced advertisers are beginning to question whether it really does pay even for the cost of printing.

This is a question that each advertising manager must work out for himself. The answer depends on many factors that are different for different stores; no fixed rule can be given. At first glance, it does seem too good an advertising chance to be lost. Every store of any size sends out thousands of packages every day. These go into the homes—the very place that all advertisers are keenly anxious to reach. On the other hand, the cost of printing even small leaflets or folders soon amounts to considerable when several thousand packages a day are to be supplied with them. Unless the returns are sure and plain, this scheme will prove a big "leak" in the advertising expense account.

21. Whether there will be returns or not depends on several things, chief among which are the care with which the matter for this advertising is selected, the character of the printed circular, the kind of home into which the circular goes, and the amount of such matter that the customer receives from other sources.

It is recommended that this method be carefully tried and the results watched. If it pays, it should be continued, of course. But unless it does pay, that is, unless enough direct sales can be traced from the use of such printed matter to cover at least ten times the cost of printing, it is better to put the money into something that does give returns. It should always be borne in mind that an advertisement that costs $50 is not paid for by sales amounting to $50. This point may seem too simple to mention; nevertheless, it is often overlooked. The cost of advertising must come out of the profits on the article—not out of its price. In department-store practice, an advertisement that costs more than 10 per cent. of the resulting sales can seldom be called successful.

The general tendency of the best modern advertising men is toward reducing the amount of printed matter that goes out. Some booklets, circulars, announcements, etc. must undoubtedly be used, whether they bring direct returns or not; but just how far to carry this method of publicity depends on circumstances and is usually determined by careful experiment. Some system of checking should be adopted, so that results will not be merely guessed at.

Some successful stores have adopted the policy of never sending more than one piece of printed matter in a package, the idea being that attention is more likely to be given to one circular than to a handful.

When printed matter is sent out, care should be taken to see that it is good. It should be of such character that it will fairly force itself on the recipient's attention. It should not be too cheap. "Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well" is an old saying that applies very forcibly to department-store printing.

MAILING LISTS

22. In stores that have found by experience that the sending out of printed matter pays, a mailing list is kept. This list is one of the most valuable assets of the advertising office, and is made up of names gathered from every conceivable source, chief among which are church-member lists, business directories, "blue books," telephone directories, club-membership lists, and other compilations of names and addresses of persons likely to be purchasers. One very large division of such a list is made up of the names of the "charge" customers of the store. Another division is compiled from the addresses taken from the sheets of the delivery department.

All these names are kept on card files and are classified and subdivided by geographical location, by some special feature, such as the business followed, or occasionally by financial standing. The names of men are kept on cards of one color, and those of women on cards of another color. This is done so that no ridiculous error may be made, such as sending a circular advertising a sale of muslin underwear to a man, or the announcement of a "drive" in cigars to a woman.

23. Keeping a List "Clean."—The great point about a mailing list is to keep it "clean"; that is, to keep it correct and free from valueless names. Changes of address must be learned and noted, and deaths and removals should be followed by canceling the proper cards. The usual method of doing this is to send out some matter at regular intervals in a sealed envelope under a 2-cent stamp. The envelope bears the usual request to the post office to return in case of non-delivery. The pieces of mail matter returned usually bear the notation of the post office as to why delivery was not made, and the mailing list can be revised from the returns received. Of course, the list of charge customers can be revised by checking the addresses with the records of the accounting department now and then.

SALES PLANS

ORIGIN AND CLASSIFICATION

24. One of the distinctive features of the business methods of department stores, more especially those of Classes B and C, is the sale, in which one or more departments offer, for a certain time, merchandise of one or more kinds at prices much lower than regular prices.

The sale idea is said to have originated with the Bon Marche, a large department store in Paris. This idea was adopted very early by American stores and has reached its highest development in this country. Notwithstanding the fact that the sale idea is used almost everywhere and is made the subject of many jokes, it is a great business-producer.

25. Sales may roughly be divided into two classes, namely, the department sale, in which only one department or one line of goods is concerned, and the general sale, which affects practically the entire store.

The general sale has been exploited to such an extent in past years that the better class of stores is gradually abandoning it, except in the phases to be mentioned later. To use an expressive phrase, the general sale has been "worked to death" by the more sensational and less careful advertisers, who have used every possible excuse—good or bad, reasonable or unreasonable—to announce "stupendous merchandizing events," in which every article in the store was (if one could believe the advertising) offered at a reduced price. There were "Challenge sales," Thanksgiving, Fourth-of-July, Labor-Day, and other holiday sales, rebuilding sales, rummage sales, remnant sales, late-season sales, and one merchant in a large Western city once used trouble in his own family as the reason for a "great scandal" sale.

REASONS FOR CONDUCTING SALES

26. Only Logical Reason for a Sale.—It is obvious that the only reason for having a sale that is of the least value to the public is one that will sensibly and logically explain why prices should be reduced. Any good reason for such price cutting is a good reason for having a sale, but there are very few such reasons. The best-managed stores today therefore reserve their advertising force for those sale events which are really founded on common-sense reason.

27. Sales for Keeping Stock Clean.—Chief among these sales reasons is undoubtedly the necessity for keeping a store's stock clean; that is, having only fresh, seasonable, desirable goods in stock. No good store ever carries old stock. If any goods are purchased that do not, for any reason, sell readily, they are reduced in price until they do sell. The large stores never count cost in such cases. If necessary, they will reduce the price of "slow" goods to a point far below cost to get rid of them.

28. Forcing Slow-Selling Goods.—The forcing of slow-selling goods is good business for several reasons. There is seldom anything to be gained by waiting. Seasonable goods that will not sell one week will sell no better the next. The loss may as well be taken first as last; in fact, the loss may better be taken early, because every week that passes puts the goods further behind the season. Moreover, the presence of slow-selling goods in stock prevents the buyer of that department from purchasing other goods that might sell better. The slow goods not only take up room that could be used for more attractive merchandise, but they also figure in the buyer's stock account. Most buyers are given a "limit" within which they must keep their stock on hand. If a buyer has reached his limit for the time being, he must turn some of his unsold stock into money before he can get more. Furthermore, "dead stock" is expensive for any firm, because it represents just so much capital lying idle, and the financial success of any department store depends very largely on the ability of the buyers to make "quick turns"; that is, to make prompt disposition of merchandise purchased in order to buy more and thus turn money over and over.

GENERAL SALES

CLEARANCE SALES

29. Clearance sales are of extreme importance when a store approaches a change of season. Merchandise belonging particularly to one season should be sold out clean. Winter clothing, for instance, must be sold before warmer weather makes it "dead stock," while summer clothing must be sold at the time the public still desires it. No well-managed store carries goods over from one season to the next. The loss in profits through forced sales is likely to be less than the loss that would accrue from carrying dead stock through an idle season, to say nothing of the probability of changes of fashion, which would make the goods entirely unsalable the following year. What is true of clothing is also true to a greater or less extent of almost all other merchandise, except staples that are in demand the year around.

30. Logical Reasons for Clearance Sales.—The clearance sales that are always advertised toward the end of a season are not only logical in their underlying reason, but they are really essential to a store's success. Such sales are the most important and the most sensible of the general sales, because there are good reasons for reducing prices, and price reductions are usually genuine and heavy. Such sales can be pushed with great vigor.

31. Proper Time for Clearance Sales.—Most stores have two clearance sales each year. One usually occurs in January (see Fig. 13), immediately following the great Christmas business; its purpose is to clean up holiday goods that are left over and to make a good beginning on the reduction of the winter stocks throughout the store. The other sale usually takes place in July or August, so as to reduce the summer stocks.

STOCK-TAKING SALES

32. Large stores "take stock" twice a year, usually about the beginning of the spring and the winter season; that is, in February or March and in August or September. Stock taking consists in the actual counting and listing of every piece of merchandise in the store. This is a very hard and tedious operation, and usually requires the services of the entire salesforce for two or three days and evenings. However, by the usual system of stock taking it is only by thus actually counting and measuring every bit of merchandise that the management is able to know exactly what is on hand and to figure what has actually been made or lost in each department during the preceding season.

It is the duty and ambition of every merchant and buyer to show as little stock on hand as possible; that is, to show as large sales as possible. This gives another very reasonable and proper excuse for a forced sale, and the stock-taking sale is the result. Stock-taking sales, as will be noted, occur at about the same time as the big clearance sales and for this reason are sometimes combined with them, as will be observed by noting the advertisement shown in Fig. 13.

OTHER GENERAL SALES

33. The clearance and stock-taking sales are the only price-reduction events that have fixed reasons. However, there may be occasional reasons equally good for similar movements, and when the reason is real and logical, it should be used to the best advantage. A removal sale may naturally be based on a good reason, namely, that it is easier to sell goods than to move them, even if the price is low. Rebuilding sales, in which the excuse for price cutting is the necessity for compressing the departments into a smaller space, to give room for carpenter's, are often founded on actual facts. Fig. 14 shows an announcement of an annual black-goods sale. Fig. 15 illustrates how the purchase of the stock of another store may be used as the advertising idea for a general sale. The mill-end sale illustrated by Fig. 16 is still an annual feature with some stores but is not so strong as it once was.

34. Factitious Sales.—Many stores have anniversary sales to celebrate their founding. The reason for such sales—that is, the reason for reducing prices—is not easy to understand. In fact, the anniversary sale, together with the challenge sale and a dozen others frequently advertised in the past, all being founded on reasons that are more imaginary than real, are being dropped by the better class of stores. The reason for their abandonment is that the public is wise enough to understand that no store can afford deliberately and generally to reduce its prices for any length of time unless there is some good business reason that makes such reductions wise and profitable. Also, the public has been taught this wisdom by the repeated efforts on the part of sensational advertisers in every city to make the appearance of reductions pass for the actual reductions. It is not necessary to practice deceit in clearance sales; in such cases, the reductions can be and usually are actually made. In the factitious, or fictitious, sales, reductions, if made at all, are made only in a spasmodic and desultory fashion. The public of a city soon associates the real bargains with the real reasons and looks askance at the imitation bargains that must necessarily accompany an imitation reason.

35. Reason for Factitious Sales.—The real reason that underlies many factitious sales today is that their success in the past has given increased sale figures for a certain day or week. Thus, in the effort to meet these figures, the same plan is tried, despite its failing efficiency.

The advertising manager should have these past sale figures in mind and should in all cases try to meet them. But he will probably find it harder and harder each year to do so with a purely arbitrary sale based on no real reason beyond this desire to equal a past performance. Far better results can be obtained by searching through the departments for real bargains, fewer in number, perhaps, but better in fact, and then pushing these on their actual merits.

In every case, when a real reason exists for a general price cutting, it should be used with vigor. The general sale, properly explained and properly advertised, is a powerful weapon and the advertiser should always be on the watch to profit by it.

DEPARTMENT SALES

36. Reasons for price cutting in certain lines of goods occur frequently and these department sales are of almost daily occurrence in all large stores. Some of these sales have become regular annual or semiannual events. Following are given some of the chief department sales.

37. Muslin-Underwear Sale.—The muslin-underwear sale, which originated with the Bon Marche, of Paris, has now become a semiannual fixture with practically all large American stores. It is timed to meet the dull months of January or February and June or July. The reason for the underpricing is large preparation and large purchases from manufacturers at a time when they are not normally busy.

38. Furniture Sale.—In department stores that carry furniture, semiannual furniture sales occur in February and in August. The furniture sale is based on exactly the same reasons as those which underlie the muslin-underwear sale.

39. House-Furnishing Sale.—In March or April and September or October, house-furnishing sales are conducted. Strictly speaking, the house-furnishing sale is seldom a sale in the usual sense, as the price cutting is not often made very prominent. It is often a purely advertising effort to draw attention to the house-furnishing lines at the seasons when such goods are most in demand. It is a seasonable movement, as opposed to the muslin-underwear, the furniture, the August-blanket, the midsummer-fur, and other sales that are distinctly unseasonable but rely on their underpricing for success.

SEASONABLE SALES

40. It has been explained that the most successful stores are working away from all except a few of the regular-sale ideas; and are holding to these few regular sales partly because there is a real reason for their continuation and partly because they are recognized by the public and money is often saved in anticipation. This explanation should be kept in mind in reading the following outline of monthly sales. Some of the ideas should prove suggestive, while some of them have been greatly overworked in many cities and will prove of little value except in communities where they have not been used to excess. The January white-goods sale, for example, is no longer carried out by some stores, because of the fact that nearly all department stores do the same thing and the competition is too strong for the sale to be the success that it was in former years. Moreover, this sale conflicts to some extent with the important clearance effort.

Neither should the following outline of sales be taken as encouragement to overdo the bargain-sale idea. The danger of this has already been pointed out.

41. January Sales.—January, coming right after the holidays and being the first month in the year, is with some stores the month taken for inventory (February and August are, however, the inventory months with most large stores). Before taking a January inventory, every effort is made to reduce the stock through a January clearance sale. At no time of the year has the department store a greater incentive to disregard profits. After the holiday rush, there is likely to be a prolonged stagnation of trade. The people are tired of shopping and they have probably spent most of their shopping money. Nothing but heavy advertising of unusual bargains will draw the shoppers from their homes and the money from their purses. Then, too, in beginning a new year, it is desirable to close out all old stock, or goods that will soon become unsalable or out of style.

This sale also appeals to the provident—those with gift money to invest; and there are a number of persons that buy articles at this season to be used as gifts throughout the year, because such articles can then be purchased at low prices.

42. Advertisements for this general clearance sale are most frequently of a catalog or price-list character, although some of the most successful sales of this kind have been advertised only by sweeping generalities, like "All toys at half price," "All clothing one-third under price," "All fancy goods at actual cost," with no "detail" at all. Bold headlines and strong opening talks of heavy cuts in prices are in order. The style of display and illustration should be varied as much as possible throughout the sale. The advertisement should give live but brief descriptions of the various items, with comparisons of the regular and the marked-down prices. Each advertisement should be new and fresh in appearance and in copy. The amount of space devoted to each department depends on circumstances. If the store is a large one, and the sale is planned to last two weeks or more, it will probably be advisable to make a leading feature of a different department each day. For instance, on one day a third of the space might be devoted to china and the remainder to eight or ten other departments. On the next day, china could be relegated to the rear, and one of the other departments given first place. If the store is not large and the sale is to last only a few days, it will probably be better to list all departments in each issue, changing the make-up and items every day. If the sale is to start on Monday, it will be advisable to insert the first large advertisement in the Sunday papers, and unless competition is likely to be encouraged thereby, it will pay to run an announcement of the approach of the sale for two or three days previous. Such an announcement might be displayed in a space of 6 or 7 inches, double column, or it might take the form of paid reading notices scattered throughout the news items of the paper. This preliminary advertising is of value in preparing the people for the larger announcements to follow, and it also gives them opportunity to save money to spend at the sale.

43. The annual white sale has for many years been a strong feature of department-store January advertising. People have been taught to expect this sale in January, and it furnishes an excellent stimulant for this dull business month. The white sale either follows immediately after the January clearance sale or is run in connection with it, being pushed to the front as soon as the clearance sale begins to weaken.

During the white sale, special prices are quoted on sheeting, table cloths, napkins, bureau scarfs, handkerchiefs, ladies' muslin underwear, shirt waists, men's shirts, collars, cuffs, etc. Window and counter displays, and the style, setting, and illustration of the advertisements should harmonize with the "white" idea.

Because there is no special reason for buying white goods in January, their sale must be forced by price inducements. Heavy cuts in prices need be made in only a few lines. These will serve as leaders to draw the crowd to the store. The displays and the salespeople will effect the proper volume of sales in all the various lines.

44. Every well-managed clothing department makes great efforts to reduce its stock of winter clothing during January by having a January clothing sale. Manufacturers of clothing are also eager at this time to dispose of their surplus, unsold production. The result is that January has become a month in which clothing advertising is perhaps the most prominent of all, and it is one of the most active months of the year in actual business done.

The argument for January business is, of course, the reduced price at which the clothing is sold. A great deal of the ammunition for clothing sales in the larger cities comes from special purchases from manufacturers, who often make extraordinary price concessions to clean up their overproduction. The store that is in a position to "snap up" these offers can sell the clothing at a very low price and still make its usual profit on the transaction. When special purchases are not made, the clothing offered is the regular stock of the department reduced in price as much as necessary to sell it. The heaviest cuts are usually made in the higher-priced clothing, as profits are largest in such grades.

Some of the very best department-store advertising that is done in the United States today is shown in the various announcements of January clothing sales. These announcements should be sharp, strong, and convincing, and as the time available for disposing of winter clothing is very short, it is usually wise to make liberal use of space in advertising the sales.

The advertising should begin with the best-grade clothing, and should continue from day to day with the lower-priced grades, with the boys and youths' clothing especially displayed in the advertisements of Friday night and Saturday morning. The sale should close with an offer of all the odd lots and broken sizes at the lowest prices of all.

45. Sales of office furniture and commercial stationery usually occur in January, as this is the month in which changes in firms and organizations are most common. Winter underwear and hosiery, men's winter neckwear, gloves and mufflers, canned goods, preserved meats, etc. are all lines that may be moved in subsidiary sales. Few sales are of sufficient importance, however, to warrant the use of all the newspaper space for their exclusive exploitation. The chief reason for this is that it is necessary to attract continuously a great number of persons to the department store each day. A certain number may be interested in the clothing sale, but that will only keep the clothing department busy. There will not be enough transient trade for all the other departments; therefore, the advertisement should contain items that will draw the trade of those not interested in clothing. No definite rule or policy can be adopted in this matter.

46. February Sales.—There is no sharply defined line between January and February sales, as a great deal depends on the weather and trade conditions. For instance, the annual white sale might easily extend into February. If the January clearance sale is so successful as to last until February 1, several of the minor sales that are usually run in January may be carried over into the next month. In the hands of an ingenious advertising manager, the special-sale idea is flexible enough to conform to any condition of business or of the weather.

In the month of February, a final effort is made to dispose of any strictly cold-weather stock left on hand, through a "winter clean-up sale" or a "February mark-down sale." Any strong title will answer the purpose. The descriptions and prices sell the goods. A good point to remember is that it is not the size of type in which figures are printed, but the prices that these figures represent that sell the goods.

47. The semiannual sale of furniture is an important event that usually takes place in February. The advertisements of such sales should be well illustrated with cuts of desirable pieces. This sale is not usually run as a clearance or a sacrifice sale. The department-store method of buying and selling keeps its prices on all grades of furniture lower than those of the ordinary retailer, yet it is doubtless good policy to make leaders of some low-cost articles by offering them at a sacrifice. Low grades of iron beds, lounges, dining-room chairs, Morris chairs, bedroom sets, tables, etc. can be bought at very low prices from factories that specialize on these classes of goods. When sold at cost or at less than cost, such goods make strong talking points and draw trade for regular-priced goods.

48. March Sales.—March is a between-seasons month. "Winter lingers in the lap of spring," the weather varies from warm to cold, and nature and the department-store stock are in a state of transition. Any winter goods that remain unsold are offered at a great sacrifice or are stored away to make room for the daily arrivals of spring goods. The first half of the month is usually devoted to various small sales lasting a day or two each. Then follow the great spring openings. Some stores have a general grand opening day for all lines of goods; others have a special opening day for millinery, another for women's suits, another for men's suits, then spring dress goods, shoes, men's furnishings, etc. These openings are important events. They mark the beginning of the lively Easter trade, which is second only to the brisk business of the holiday season. They are characterized by the use of large space and lavish store decorations. Big stores run announcement advertisements, often as large as a page, that merely extend invitations to the public to attend their annual spring opening. Artistic and striking illustrations prevail in such announcements, representing Easter lilies, angels, Parisian belles, etc. The day before the opening, large space is used—sometimes a double page filled with artistic illustrations and glowing descriptions of charming hats, shimmering silks, stunning gowns, and dainty lingerie. The newspaper advertising does not follow the style of bargain-sale advertisements. Price is for the time being relegated to second place, and quality reigns supreme. The newspaper announcements are frequently supplemented by dainty cards of invitation sent to selected lists of names, by street-car advertisements, etc. As the spring opening takes place about three weeks before Easter, millinery and dress goods are the chief attractions. Women flock to see the new-pattern hats and imported gowns, and the sales in milliners and dressmakers' materials reach the maximum.

Small special sales are run in connection with the spring-opening advertisements, such as corset sales, shoe sales, clothing sales, etc. But prices are fairly well maintained on all the leading lines until perhaps one or two days after Easter, when goods that are likely to depreciate in value are offered at a sacrifice.

All through this opening season, the advertisements should be varied in appearance and contents as much as possible. Special features, such as demonstrations, recitals, exhibitions of paintings, presentation of souvenirs, etc., frequently aid in maintaining a steady flow of customers to the store. Figs. 17, 18, and 19 illustrate a number of spring advertisements.

49. April Sales.—After Easter come the special sales of millinery, suits, and all other lines of men's and women's furnishings. Cotton, silk, and linen dress fabrics are pushed to the front. Paints, wallpaper, garden tools and seeds, curtains, carpets, and general house-furnishings sell well in April and also in May. April is usually characterized by frequent showers; hence, sales of umbrellas, overshoes, and waterproof garments are timely and effective.

50. May Sales.—May is almost universally a month of moving and house cleaning; it is also the first month in which outdoor life is really enjoyable. These two important facts furnish the reason for two big May sales—a sale of house furnishings and a sale of outdoor goods. The first sale embraces everything that goes to beautify the home or to make it more comfortable, from kitchen utensils to parlor suits. In this month, demonstrations of food products help to draw the crowd and to introduce new edibles. May is also a good month to close out all canned goods remaining in stock, and lower prices on all lines of fresh goods ought to keep the grocery department busy. The second sale specializes on baby carriages, fishing tackle, hammocks, sporting goods, seeds, bulbs, and early summer clothing. Shirt waists, parasols, low shoes, silk underskirts, and fancy hose are in demand toward the end of the month. If the weather is quite warm, summer underwear will sell with a rush.

51. June Sales.—The first month of summer is likely to show a falling off in business unless the advertising manager puts forth his best efforts. The business in all varieties of summer dress goods, straw hats, tan shoes, and outing goods is at its full height. Dresses and presents for June brides and graduates furnish the text for a good special sale. Porch furniture, camp and summer-home supplies, tourists' supplies, etc. are material for another sale. Fans, soda fountains, and ice-cream parlors are good things to mention in the advertisements, as they make the store seem inviting and comfortable. Fig. 20 is an example of a June advertisement of special lines.

52. July Sales.—July is likely to be a dull month, as it is between seasons. The hot weather keeps people off the streets, and almost every one is saving money for vacation expenses. But a "midsummer sale" enables the department store to make strong price inducements and thus draw trade and get rid of the bulk of summer goods. This sale should be advertised and conducted on lines similar to those of the January clearance sale, only it must be pushed more vigorously on account of the hot weather. Some stores take a semiannual inventory in July. This affords an opportunity for another big sale.

The advertisement shown in Fig. 21 illustrates how a midsummer sale is advertised.

53. August Sales.—It is perhaps more difficult to force business in August than in any other month of the year. Many vacationists are either enjoying their outings or have returned with depleted pocketbooks. But there are many business and professional persons that are obliged to remain at home and make themselves as comfortable as the weather will permit; and right here is a key-note for successful August advertising, namely, comfort. An uncomfortable man or woman will go a long way to get anything conducive to comfort; therefore, special sales of ice-cream freezers, straw hats, crash suits, shirt waists for women, cool underwear, etc. are in order. The advertisements should suggest ways and means of keeping cool and comfortable. Remind the public of the coolness of the store. Advertise to give an ice-cream-soda check with every dollar purchase. Invite people to "step in and rest and enjoy the orchestra music while eating ice cream in the store's electrically cooled restaurant." Such lines of early summer goods as were not sold during the July clearance sale should be offered at prices that will positively move them. With many stores, this is inventory month and the month for midsummer clearance. Many persons start on their vacations in August and need trip supplies; the vacation-supply idea is a good one for a number of August advertisements.

54. September Sales.—The first month of fall marks a general increase in business. Vacationists have returned and are ready to attend the fall openings. Displays of new cloths and new styles in men's, women's, and children's clothing attract the crowd and pave the way for future business. Then, there are new hats, gloves, hosiery, shoes, men's furnishings, and dozens of smaller lines that are in demand, ready to respond quickly to advertising stimulation. The pickling and preserving season is at hand, and the grocery and house-furnishing departments can be kept busy helping housewives lay up their fall and winter food supplies. The cool evenings cause people to provide for indoor comforts, and special sales of books, lamps, furniture, carpets, and curtains will be well attended. Clothing and supplies for school children are subject to a sudden demand because of the reopening of the public schools, and the well-advertised department store will get the cream of this business. Advertisements during this month can deal largely with new goods rather than with a great many cut-price offerings.

55. October Sales.—The first frosts are pertinent reminders of the need for woolen underwear, hosiery, and heavy clothing. Business comes easily in October, and all seasonable stocks respond quickly to good advertising. The bargain style is not so essential as in the duller months, and the advertisements may be of a more general character.

Toward the last of the month, however, special sales of fall overcoats, women's jackets, and millinery may be run if there is any lull in business activity.

56. November Sales.—In November every effort is made to close out all autumn goods. Heavy underwear and winter hosiery are pushed to the front, and winter-clothing sales increase daily as the month wears on. Thanksgiving affords a splendid opportunity for a special sale of groceries, cutlery, and table furnishings. The theatrical season is now in full swing, and the social activities of the month make jewelry, furs, silks, laces, etc. especially salable.

Fig. 22 is an example of a November advertisement.

57. December Sales.—From the point of view of the advertising manager, the holiday season begins right after Thanksgiving. Special sales of dress goods and materials for home-made Christmas presents are timely and effective. Such materials sell well up to within a week before Christmas. Immediately after December 1, the advertisements should be full of special items describing articles suitable for Christmas gifts, helping persons to make selections from the varied assortment on sale in the store. It is characteristic of Americans to put off buying Christmas presents until the very last day or two. As a result, the store is likely to be so crowded that trade is actually kept away. Valuable goods are damaged in the rush, and the procrastinating customers usually go away dissatisfied with the things they have purchased chiefly because they did not know what else to buy. The enterprising advertising manager endeavors to obviate these undesirable conditions by encouraging the early purchase of presents. Many persons buy such substantial presents as furniture, silverware for the table, etc., and it is easy to stimulate early buying in these lines. For example, the suggestion can be made that by buying silverware early, initials can be engraved before the 25th. This suggestion would likely relieve the engraving department a little.

Fig. 23 is a typical illustration of a December advertisement.

An advertisement of the annual "white sale" usually conducted early in January by most department stores. Note the omission of the holly border on the left side of the advertisement, which would come in the fold of the newspaper.

ADVERTISING A SALE

58. Preliminary Announcements.—Whatever the sale may be, the advertising feature of it is the important essential to its success. The advertising man should therefore endeavor to impress the importance of a sale on the public, for if he does not treat it seriously, he cannot expect the public to be impressed. Unless there is danger of attracting competition (a danger very real in most cities), the advertising man should begin by making preliminary announcements of a sale two or three days before the event begins. These announcements may be made through the newspapers or by means of circulars, or both methods may be used. It is not customary to mention prices in these announcements, owing to the likelihood of having a competitor cut under them, but the importance, scope, and advantage of the movement should be forcefully portrayed.

59. The First Advertisement.—The first newspaper advertisement in which prices are given should be published on the evening before the sale or on the morning that the sale is to begin. By every means in his power—by the use of large space, good pictures, and strong talk—the advertising man should drive home the fact that the sale is an important movement. All the accessories at his command—the windows, the store cards, the printed matter, the bill boards, if he uses them, and even the delivery wagons—should be enlisted in the campaign.

60. Reserving of Fresh Offers.—In preparing the first large advertisement, the advertising man should keep in mind that the sale must be kept going as long as the public shows the slightest interest in it. The larger stores in New York and Chicago keep their clearance, furniture, muslin-underwear, and other big sales alive for a full month. To do this requires that both the buyer and the advertiser must be resourceful. It is not easy to “dish up” the same story day after day in a fresh and interesting manner; and the best way to avoid monotony is to have a different story to tell every day. This means that the whole story must not be told on the first day; also, that the buyers and the advertising man must keep new offers in reserve so that they can be put out as they are needed and thus keep interest alive. New pictures should be used every day, and new arguments based on the new offers or on different classes of goods should be printed each time. For example, the following schedule was used by a large New York department store in one of its February furniture sales:

JAN. 31.—Preliminary announcement.

FEB. 1, SUNDAY.—First large advertisement; a full page. Introduction, a general explanation of the reasons underlying the sale. The details were fifty-five offers of all kinds of furniture. Store decorated with special signs calling attention to the sale on the fifth floor. Windows decorated with furniture.

FEB. 2.—Half-page advertisement; practically a summary of the preceding advertisement.

FEB. 3.—Half-page advertisement, headed Brass and Iron Bedsteads in the Furniture Sale. Detail, chiefly on bedsteads, with a summary of other kinds of furniture.

FEB. 4.—Five-column advertisement headed Bedroom Furniture. The details were features of that class of merchandise.

FEB. 5.—Four-column advertisement headed Parlor Furniture in the February Furniture Sale. The details were features in parlor furniture, with brief mention of offers of other kinds.

Each day, for five or six following days, a different class of furniture was featured. Then a full-page advertisement filled with entirely new offers on all kinds of furniture was printed. From this date, the furniture-sale advertisements gradually grew smaller. In each case, they treated of some special class of furniture, as in the previous week. Toward the last of the month they treated only of single items. Three days before the end of the month the space was again increased to half pages with the "final bargains," using the argument that normal prices would prevail after the month was over. The final bargains brought the purchasers to whom extraordinary offerings appeal.

61. Proper Length of Time to Continue Sales.—It is not every sale that can be kept alive for a full month. By far the greater number of such events are for a single day only. Some of the more important can be kept alive and interesting for a week, but only the big annual or semiannual events can be successfully “hammered” for a longer time. The rule may safely be given that a sale should be continuously advertised as long as the public shows interest. It does no good whatever to waste space on a movement that falls flat. Such an event should be dropped and something else found to talk about.

SUBURBAN AND MAIL-ORDER ADVERTISING

GETTING OUT-OF-TOWN BUSINESS

62. The field of the city department store is by no means confined to its immediate neighborhood. In fact, its limits are only those set by the cost of transportation. Every large city has its suburbs, the residents of which do their shopping partly in small, local stores and partly in the city itself. It is therefore the duty of the advertising manager of the city store to attract as much of this suburban trade as he can. Suburban business is hard to get, but it is extremely valuable, because it is very likely to “stick”; that is, a suburbanite that once becomes a customer of a city store is very likely to remain a customer, as he has not the temptation to shift about from one store to another that the city dweller has.

In Fig. 25 is shown a small panel that a large Brooklyn store runs regularly in its advertisements for the benefit of suburban readers.

63. Use of Suburban Papers.—When the city newspapers circulate so widely in the suburban districts that they may be said to cover the field thoroughly, there is no need of other newspaper advertising. But where there are suburban newspapers of standing and influence that have a large circle of readers, it is well to use such papers. As these papers are chiefly weeklies, it is necessary to print offers that will be good for several days, not merely special offers for the next day.

64. Refunding of Car Fare.—Some department stores make the offer to refund car fare to customers that come from a distance. The distance for which transportation is paid, however, depends on the size of the purchase. Agreeing to refund car fare is a successful way to attract trade from out of town, but it has a weak point in that it opens opportunity for some fraud. Customers of unscrupulous mind will claim a rebate even when they live in the city and have not paid a cent of car fare. Each store has its own method of protecting itself against such customers, however, one of the best being to give the customer an order for the amount of the car fare on some agent (usually the railroad station agent) located in the town from which the customer claims to have come.

MAIL-ORDER ADVERTISING

65. Practically all large department stores have a mail-order department of more or less importance and do much advertising to attract purchases by mail. Mail-order advertising is really a distinct branch of the advertising business and is one that every department-store advertising man should understand thoroughly and be able to handle.

OFFICE MANAGEMENT

ADVERTISING MANAGER'S RESPONSIBILITIES

66. Qualifications for an Advertising Manager. It is perhaps unnecessary here to suggest how an advertising manager should behave toward his subordinates. Each man will meet this phase of duty according to his own temperament and experience. But it may be said that unless a manager has or can cultivate an even-tempered patience and a perfect sense of justice; that unless he knows or can learn to know when to be lenient and when to be severe; or, in short, that unless he can school himself in the management of others, he will be unsuccessful. A busy advertising office is no place for a man that cannot control his own nerves and temper. The work is usually done under considerable pressure; time is precious; interruptions are many; and trials and troubles, accidents and mistakes, are frequent. It is absolutely necessary to preserve through the hardest days a calm self-possession and a perfect mastery of one's own powers and dignity. The advertising man that allows a sudden emergency to throw him off his balance, or that relieves his own tense nerves by scolding or bullying his subordinates, seldom proves permanently successful.

67. Relations Between Advertising Manager and Buyers.—As has been previously explained, it is from the buyers of the various departments that the advertising manager secures the material for preparing the daily announcements. Within certain limits, which vary in every store, the buyer is the sole judge of what shall be advertised from his department, the price at which it shall be advertised, and the day that the advertisement shall appear. It is thus obvious that the buyer and the advertising manager must be in constant communication and work in close harmony.

The advertising man is, of course, just as much in control of his department as are the buyers in control of theirs. A certain amount of jealous regard for one's authority and command is justifiable and necessary. As the success of the advertising man depends on the results he secures, he should not be interfered with in his efforts to obtain results; with full responsibility should properly go full authority. He must, in the large sense, stand or fall on his own judgment. Strictly speaking, it is for him to say what space shall be given, what newspapers shall be used, and what language shall be employed.

As previously stated, experienced advertising managers in large stores are usually in absolute command of their own departments and allow no interference from anybody except the general manager or the proprietor. This absolute authority is wise and advisable—often actually necessary—but it is open to abuse. Its exercise sometimes leads the advertising man to arbitrary and dictatorial methods that antagonize the buyers. Such a condition is usually bad for the store and is often disastrous for the advertising man himself. No well-managed store permits friction between departments, and the easiest way of smoothing things out is to discharge the advertising man and get one that possesses more tact. One of the first things, therefore, that an advertising manager must learn is to be strong, self-reliant, and thoroughly the master of his office, yet tactful, wise, and diplomatic. It is not too strong a statement to say that his success depends on the confidence in which he is held, not alone by his employers, but also by the buyers.

68. Often the most difficult task that will confront the advertising manager is the "handling," so to speak, of those important members of the organization—the buyers. They are themselves usually strong men, masters of their business, of long experience, perfectly in touch with the needs and preferences of the public, and frequently good advertising men. They usually have well-settled opinions as to the relative value of the different newspapers and mediums used, and these opinions cannot be ignored, because they are frequently based on actual experience. Many of the buyers are skilful writers and are disinclined to have their copy changed or their demands refused.

By going about it in the right way, the advertising man can do much toward inducing the buyers to furnish the kind of material he wishes. A "heart-to-heart" talk with a buyer given to the habit of grossly exaggerating the value of his offerings will enable the advertising man to make clear the fact that such a practice is injurious, in the long run, to the business of the store. The very improbable story that a shoe buyer may ask to have published must be eliminated without offending him. The editing, eliminating, and elaborating of buyers' copy should always be done without any exaggerated attitude of superior ability on the part of the advertising man.

69. The beginner in any store will be wise to listen to what is told him by the buyers, and to take good care to consider their suggestions or demands carefully before refusing them. An advertising man should listen well, consider carefully and thoughtfully, and be courteous and patient under all conditions of hurry or stress; then he should make up his mind, after a conscientious review of all sides, what is best and stick to it. He should make it a rule to please if possible, but never at the cost of what he believes to be best for the general business. Success will depend on his own judgment. If he judges wisely and well, his employers will be pleased with the results and the buyers will learn to have confidence in him. If he judges unwisely, or if he permits himself to be swayed this way and that by argument or appeal, he will not last long.

70. Demands for Favors.—In nearly all large stores and in most small ones, much trouble will come through the demands of certain buyers to be given the preferred position in the advertisement or to be given more than their share of space. For example, it will frequently happen on days that the largest advertisements are being prepared that two or more buyers will each demand the "top of the page" or the largest amount of space. Sometimes, this difficulty can be adjusted by giving each buyer the preferred position in different papers, or, in some cases, one buyer can be shown that by good display his department will be just as prominent as if it were at the top of the advertisement; but when all wish to use the same newspaper and the same position, it is obvious that some one must give way. When the conflict of demands cannot be adjusted by compromise, the advertising man should decide which buyer should have the preference, on grounds of common sense and with a keen eye for the good of the general business. In case the advertising man does not wish to assume the responsibility, he should appeal to the general manager for a decision; but this should be done only as a last resort. The advertising manager should always try to run his office without help. An appeal to higher authority by either the advertising manager or a buyer is sometimes a confession of weakness; often, however, it is unavoidable.

RATIO OF ADVERTISING COST TO SALES

71. It is not always an easy matter to determine whether an advertisement or a series of advertisements has been successful. The failure to measure returns properly is the cause of frequent disaster to the advertising man. The ability of an advertising man is not reckoned, or, rather, should not be reckoned, merely on the amount of money that is spent on advertising or the amount that is saved over a previous expenditure. It would be an easy matter to spend less money, under any circumstances, than was spent in a previous year. The true test is the ratio of the cost of advertising to sales, and it is on such ratio, or percentage, that an advertising man is always judged.

Just what the ratio should be is a question that cannot be settled definitely. It varies with the location of the store, the character of the trade, the degree of competition, the cost of newspaper space, and the kinds of goods sold.

Some department stores get along well by spending 2 per cent. of the gross sales in advertising, while other stores have been known to spend as high as 8 per cent. The proportion varies, also, in each department. As a general rule, the staple goods that are not sold on points of novelty or style cost least to advertise. Such articles as blankets, house-furnishings, curtains, kitchenware, sheets, pillow cases, etc. are sold on a very low advertising cost—in some stores for as low as one-half of 1 per cent. This is partly due to the fact that such goods seldom possess “talkable” selling points that require generous advertising space to carry them and partly because they are usually sold at a very small margin of profit, which enforces great economy in selling cost.

72. On articles of less staple character than those just mentioned in which the profit is usually much larger, and on articles in which seasonableness plays an important part, it is almost invariably true that the advertising ratio must be larger, because the goods require quicker selling. Thus, for women’s tailored suits, which all stores push very hard in the spring and in the fall, the advertising ratio climbs up to 5 or 6 per cent. in many well-advertised stores. The cost of advertising books sold on the subscription plan is often as high as 20 per cent. of their sales, but as the profit is usually more than 150 per cent., this advertising cost is not extravagant, especially when the other selling expense is low.

73. In determining the proper percentage of advertising to sales the advertiser should consider these four points that follow:

1. What is the profit on the article?
2. What is the quantity on hand?
3. Is it necessary to force sales?
4. What is the selling expense other than advertising cost?

If, for example, the article is a pair of skates on which the profit is 50 per cent., and there is only one or two months in which to sell the stock and their selling requires only one low-priced salesman, more can be expended in advertising than would be advisable if the conditions were not so favorable. On the other hand, if the stock consists of Oriental rugs, which sell the year around, bring only 40 or 50 per cent. profit, and require large space for storage, showing, and selling and several high-priced salesmen to do the selling, the advertising cost should be governed accordingly. The quantity of goods on hand is a factor that should always be kept in mind. Well-written, well-conceived, and well-illustrated advertisements on special lines of goods are frequently seen that are poor investments in spite of their good features, because the space would scarcely be paid for even if all the advertised goods were sold.

74. In planning advertisements, it should be remembered that results are what count, not the money spent. No expenditure that brings commensurate return is extravagant; no economy that weakens the result is a wise economy. On the other hand, expenditures that do not bring commensurate returns always reflect on the advertising man's ability. If an advertisement that costs $100 brings in $1,000 in sales, the results may be considered as first class; but if $1,000 is spent for the same advertisement, and it brings in $10,000 in sales, the results are greater. The ratio in the second case is the same as that in the first, but the advertisement has been the means of selling more goods, unlocking more money, and bringing more customers to the store.

75. Direct Returns vs. Indirect Returns.—In department-store work, it is customary to allow, for advertising, a slightly higher percentage of the direct sales than would be considered good business policy in other advertising work, because there is always more return from the advertising than the direct sales show. Customers come in response to the advertising and buy other goods than those advertised; this keeps down the direct-sales showing, but helps out the average of the day quite as well as if the advertised goods had been bought. But while the total advertising for the day must always be considered in connection with the total sales of the day, as a matter of justice to the advertising, it is well to watch the direct sales carefully, because there may be danger of advertising the wrong articles. Wise department-store advertising managers always keep two sets of percentages—one, the percentage of advertising to total sales; the other, the percentage of advertising to sales of the advertised goods.

76. Records as a Guide.—The claim of a buyer for advertising space must be considered with his previous advertising and his department ratio in mind. If the buyer's advertising cost is creeping beyond the proper point, either he or the advertising man is at fault, and the fault must be corrected. The goods may be wrong or the prices may be too high; or, the advertising man may not be conducting his work along the right lines.

As has been stated, it is impossible to give definite figures of advertising cost in proportion to sales, because they vary under various conditions and under various managements. As a general thing, however, it will be found that the proprietor or general manager has decided views on this point, which will be impressed on the advertising man at the beginning of his service. In default of such instructions, the advertising man should be governed by good sense and business judgment. Considering all the best stores throughout the United States, it is probable that an advertising cost equal to 3 per cent. of the total sales is something like the average. But the figure varies with each store, each locality, and each manager.

It is obvious, therefore, that the duty of the advertising man is to make his advertising ratio, under all circumstances, as low as he can. He should watch results carefully and keep accurate records and study them. Every possible method of decreasing cost and of increasing efficiency should be considered, but there should be no hesitation to increase the cost of advertising if efficiency is also increased proportionately. The problem is complicated, but it is also fascinating and will repay the most careful study.

KEEPING OF RECORDS

77. The advertising manager must be able to answer any question concerning his own office at any time. As has been previously stated, department-store figures are very largely comparative; that is, the measure of success or failure and the questions of expenditure or retrenchment are settled to a great extent by the precedents established in previous years. The great test question that governs most problems of expenditure is, What did we do last year? On what was done and on the result of what was done depend most of the decisions for the future.

This means that the advertising office must have a very complete record of all its work and its results. It would be ridiculous to do a thing one year if it had been tried the previous year and proved unsuccessful. On the other hand, unless some good reason exists, it would be unwise to omit doing a thing one year that had proved successful the previous year. The records of an advertising office should show the condensed experience of that office, and they should be kept in such a way that they will be valuable not only to the advertising man in charge but also to his successors.

78. File Books.—First among these records are the file books. There should be one large book, or general file book, as it is called, into which is pasted with its date and the name of the medium in which it appeared, every advertisement printed by the store. Many managers divide this file book into several parts—one for daily newspapers, one for weeklies, one for monthlies, and one for “miscellaneous,” such as programs, souvenir books, etc. Each office will have its own system, founded on its own requirements, but somewhere there must be a copy of every advertisement that is printed, and this copy must be in a place where it can be found instantly.

Many managers write the results of such advertisements on the margins of the clippings, and at the same time make a memorandum of the weather that prevailed on the day of sale. If this system is followed, a cipher code should be employed, for no store desires to have its actual figures of sales generally known, and file books are sometimes exposed to the scrutiny of more eyes than those of the management.

79. Department File Books.—In addition to the general file book or books, there should be a set of department file books, one for each department. In these books, the department advertising clipped from the large general advertisements is filed. This is done to enable the manager to ascertain instantly the facts about the advertising done by any department without taking the trouble to measure up from the general file book. Results of specific advertisements should be kept carefully in these department books, using the same cipher code employed for the general file book. It will then be easy to refer to any department sale and learn just what the result of a certain kind of advertising was. If the result was great, it is usually wise to follow the same line of argument when possible. If the result was meager, an attempt should be made to learn the reason, and if the advertising was at fault, it should be improved when the occasion arises again.

80. File Book for Printed Matter.—Another file book should be used for the printed matter prepared by the advertising department. In this book should be pasted a sample of every folder, booklet, card, letter form, envelope, announcement, circular, etc., that the store distributes. Each sample should be endorsed with the quantity used; the method of distribution, whether mailed, distributed by hand, placed in packages, or otherwise; the name of the printer and the price paid the printer; together with a memorandum of results attained, if they can be determined. A good file book of printed matter, properly endorsed, is extremely valuable, not only for its suggestions, but for its educational value in regard to the cost of printing—a point on which no advertising man can be too well informed.

81. Suggestion File.—Another very valuable record for the busy advertising man is the suggestion file, or, as one prominent advertiser calls it, the "department of inspiration." This usually takes the form of an ordinary box file or indexed scrap book, and in it are kept, under department headings, every good piece of printed matter, every effective idea, every particularly good advertisement, and every newspaper item that contains possible material for future advertising use.

No man, however brilliant, can afford to ignore suggestions from other minds. Of course, no copying should be done—although this frequently happens—but there is no objection whatever to adopting a good idea that is thought to be valuable, provided it can be done in a dignified manner and without injury to the originator, and especially if an improvement can be made on the way the other man has used the idea.

82. Competitors' File. — Expert department-store advertising men watch their competitors closely. In most stores, a file of the advertising of their rivals is kept as carefully as their own. One reason for keeping this file is to watch and profit by the successes or mistakes of the rivals, and this involves the necessity of keeping informed about the real results of their efforts. Actual figures cannot be obtained, of course, but some careful observer is usually sent to the rival store to determine the amount of attendance and the general results, and this information is then noted on the advertisement in question. Chiefly, however, the purpose of the competitors' file is to be warned in advance of important movements. It is almost a fixed rule among department stores that big sales will be repeated each year on about the same date. This is because the buyer of the department concerned desires to "beat his own figures" of the preceding year and will always try to do it either on the same day or at least in the same week. Therefore, if a rival has some special sale movement that gives very large returns, the advertising man can be fairly sure that on the same day of the next year some effort on the part of this rival will be made to meet those sale figures. The advertising man can then govern himself accordingly. It will not do to let a competitor have all the business in that line on that day.

83. Advertising-Expense Records.—The advertising expense of each day, divided into departments, and the news-shown a simple form for keeping a weekly record of the advertising done with different newspapers. Fig. 27 illustrates a form used for distributing the weekly advertising expenditures among the different departments.

The space occupied by general headlines, general introductions, borders, etc. can be charged either to the general advertising expense or to each department in proportion to its size. This expense is usually charged separately, but, finally, together with such expense as salaries, etc., it is distributed pro rata among the different department accounts.

Every advertising manager will, of course, make up forms to meet his individual requirements.

84. The keeping of such records is in the line of accounting work, and can be attended to by an assistant. Some stores combine these records with the record of sales results. In such cases, the bookkeeping department can furnish the sales figures. A record of the sales of advertised merchandise in each department may be kept separate from the sales of other goods, and sent to the head of the firm or the merchandise manager promptly at the end of the day's business, together with—if sales have not been good—samples of the fabrics or garments, as the case may be.

If the sales have not been what they should be, the general manager or the merchandise man, the advertising man, and the buyer should hold a conference and try to find out why the advertisement did not sell the goods. If the poor sale cannot be attributed to the weather or to some sudden diversion of public attention, there are just three other ways to account for it: (1) It was not advertised properly—in language or display or both; (2) it was not good value—either intrinsically or as compared with the offerings of some other store; or, (3) it was not sufficiently seasonable.

Getting at the truth may result in making some one feel uncomfortable, but if the advertisement was weak, the value poor, or the goods too much out of season to sell well, it is a good thing for the store to have the advertising man, the buyer, or the merchandise man learn of the weakness of the sale. Such a course, if intelligently followed, will inevitably lead to a reduction of the cost percentage.

ment that his offerings are about to be advertised. He is thus given an opportunity to be fully prepared. It is customary to send a clipping of the advertisement with this form.

In Fig. 29 is shown a heading of a sheet on which omitted items are pasted and returned to the head of a department.

In Fig. 30 is shown an advertising order. This blank is used to instruct a newspaper in regard to inserting an advertisement, and covers the date of insertion, the amount of space, and the position the advertisement is to occupy. This blank is usually made in triplicate, one copy for the newspaper, one for the advertising-office file, and one for the bookkeeping department.

86. Competitors' Expense Records.—It is customary in the largest stores to keep a record of the expenditure of competitors for purposes of comparison. If a rival store makes large increases or sudden diminutions in the amount of space used in newspapers or other mediums, it may be of importance to take notice of it and to try to ascertain the reason. Perhaps the rival store has discovered something that has been overlooked by the advertising man. In all these matters relating to competitors the advertising man must be governed by good judgment. He should not follow blindly the competitor's lead; the competitor may be wrong. On the other hand, the advertising man should not obstinately ignore what is being done by a rival; the rival may be right. Eternal vigilance is the price of advertising success.

SHOPPERS

87. In large stores, as has been stated previously, there is a staff of expert shoppers, whose duty it is to keep the advertising office (or the merchandise office) fully informed of the business being done and the values being offered in competing stores.

Every advertising office should have its own medium of information. If there is no regular shopping force, some clerk in the office should be selected. If no clerk can be found to do this work, some keen-eyed, close-mouthed sales-girl should be chosen.

It is well to remember that the only possible value of a shopper is in giving the advertising man the exact facts, unprejudiced either way. The shopper that always finds things better in other stores is not quite so bad as the one that always finds things the other way, but it might be well to try somebody else before accepting her judgment.

With a competent shopper at his command, the advertising manager is guarded against making many mistakes that otherwise might injure him. If a buyer represents an article as "worth a dollar," the shopper should be sent out to learn what is the best article of that kind that can be bought elsewhere for a dollar. If necessary, the shopper should be instructed to buy the article and bring it back; then the advertising man can compare his buyer's offer with the proved facts.

When a competitor advertises an article at a lower price, a shopper should at once be sent to buy it. This article should be examined and the buyer of such articles should be called in to explain why he is undersold; and in such cases the advertising man should not be too easily satisfied with the buyer's answer.

The shopper should also keep the advertising man regularly informed of how other stores of the same class are doing. If it is learned that any one store is constantly busier than the one in which the advertising man is employed, it is his duty to find out why and attempt to change that condition at once; that is what the advertising man is employed to do. He may not be able all at once to overcome a successful rival, but he must study the rival's methods as reported by his shopper, study the goods brought to him by her, look into the rival's values, analyze the rival's advertising, and then "beat" the rival on all points if he can.

Shoppers are also used to test the salespeople and the service of the store in which they are employed, but this testing is rather in the province of the general manager.

EXTRA-OFFICIAL POWERS OF THE ADVERTISING MAN

88. The advertising man may well ask, in view of the preceding remarks, "What right have I to interfere with the merchandizing end of the business? I am only the advertising manager; how can I control the buyers and the management?"

The answers to these questions depend a great deal on the advertising man that asks them and on the store in which he is employed. Strictly speaking, the advertising manager controls only his own branch of the business, and, except as is pointed out later, has no more right to interfere with the buyer than the buyer has to dictate to him. In practice, however, there is no sharp distinction—no precise line that neither may overstep. There is nothing to prevent the buyer from making suggestions to the advertising man as to the advertising, and he frequently does. This situation has already been treated and the proper method of meeting it outlined. Much depends on whether suggestions are good. An advertising man that refuses to listen to suggestions from anybody is unwise; and if he refuses to adopt a suggestion that he sees is good, merely because it did not originate with him, he is worse than unwise.

In a similar manner, the advertising man is perfectly free to make suggestions to the buyer. If the suggestions are good (and the advertising man has the testimony of his shopper to support them), the buyer should listen and consider. If he does not, he is in the wrong and may justly be led to suffer for it.

89. In nearly all stores, especially the large ones, the advertising man has greater liberty than that possessed by the buyers or by any one else in the store except the general manager. In fact, it is the advertising man's right and duty to make suggestions to the management itself. This duty cannot be given too serious attention; it is full of possibilities for the advertising man's own good, as witness the number of men that have entered a store as advertising managers and ended by becoming general managers or part owners.

By virtue of his position as the man responsible for the increase of sales, the advertising manager has great freedom along these executive lines. There is scarcely anything that can happen in any department that does not more or less directly affect the increase of sales and therefore affect the interests he has in charge. Therefore, wise, carefully considered, fully worked-out suggestions on almost any point concerning the business, whether strictly relating to advertising or not, are made with perfect propriety and will usually be received with attention. If they are good suggestions, they will be adopted. The advertising manager that gains a reputation of exercising good judgment and clear thought, of having keen foresight, and of forming correct conclusions is much more than merely an advertising manager; he is usually the right hand of the general manager and very frequently becomes the general manager himself.

ADVICE TO BEGINNERS

90. The position of advertising manager in a store of any size opens the door to a mastery of modern retailing in all its branches—a door that is open to no other man in the organization in an aspect so wide and inviting. In this field of effort, the great rewards come to the men of ideas, coupled with common sense, and executive force. The fundamental duty of an advertising man is to furnish ideas. He should keep his head clear, or the ideas will not come clearly. The stress and pressure of a busy office, the constant, watchful vigilance demanded of the position, the necessity for quick decisions, the never-ceasing grind of the daily work—all these draw heavily on a man's vitality and mental alertness.

The records of the advertising business, like the records of journalism, which is a field somewhat allied to it in character, show that this unending mental stress and nervous activity are likely to create a desire for artificial stimulant.

Both advertising and journalistic fields are thickly carpeted with the metaphorical bodies of those who have yielded to this temptation. Natural talent—even brilliant genius—has fallen far short of even moderate success because of it. There is no intent in this purely commercial treatise to drag in an uncalled-for argument on temperance; nevertheless, the warning is perfectly legitimate—as legitimate as would be a warning against accidental poisoning in a treatise on the method of choosing edible mushrooms.

Again, it is wise to warn the advertising man against the danger of mingling business and friendship. The advertising manager of a large store is the dispenser of much business that is eagerly sought by newspapers and printers. It is the natural policy of solicitors of business to try to “stand well” with the advertising man, and the easiest way to do this is by extending personal favors.

The advertising man should be careful about accepting personal favors from anybody with whom he may do business, no matter how slight or casual such matters may appear. He should not do anything nor accept anything that will render it even in the slightest degree embarrassing for him to refuse to do a favor in return. He may do as he likes with his own money; but the money he spends for newspaper space or printing is not his own; it is a trust in his hands. He should let no consideration of personal preference, friendship, favors received or favors expected, influence him, but should be governed only by the thought of what is best for his employers.
